He would add a single word in reply to the complaints that had been made of the Committee of Ways and Means for not reporting a bill. What was the proposition of the committee? Why, that the members of that House should be called on, like men, to record their votes, ay or no, for the proposition presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, and recommended to their favorable consideration by the Executive. Did that bar the legislation of the House? Certainly not. Suppose the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had reported a bill. If he had, he (Mr. G.) must be permitted to say that the business of the country would not have been forwarded by it. It would have come in behind the bill of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the bill of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts; and thus not probably be reached this session.

Mr. G. said that, if this plan of the Executive was the Democratic Republican plan for keeping the public money that it was represented to be, he wished every gentleman there to have an opportunity of recording his vote upon it. He had voted against the sub-treasury; and he wanted now to have an opportunity of recording his vote against this exchequer plan, which he considered emphatically a sub-treasury, with a most powerful Government bank engrafted upon it. He would not say thus much of the plan of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He looked upon it as one of the most harmless machines he ever saw; though the one of the Executive was the most powerful, dangerous, and pernicious agent that any Government could be possessed of, controlling all the commerce of the country, and bringing all its business within the influence of the Executive.

Mr. G., in conclusion, said he rose merely to say that if the gentleman from Virginia had seen the result he expected when the reference of this subject was made to the Committee of Ways and Means, he had seen the result he desired when he gave it his vote. When the resolution reported by the committee came up, he hoped that, if there was any gentleman here who favored the plan of the Executive, he would move to strike out the the word "not," so as to get a direct vote for or against it. If no such motion should be made, he would then conclude that there was not a single member present who was in favor of the plan.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, supported the motion of the gentleman from New York, and defended the report of the committee, contending that they had obeyed the order of the House in presenting the report they did. Had the committee reported a bill, as the gentleman from Massachusetts argued that they should, the business of the House would not have been forwarded by it; for it would have to take it's place on the calendar behind the bill of the Select Committee, and he did not know but a dozen other propositions on the the same subject. He believed that the country wanted action, not abstract reports; and therefore he thought it best to let the House take up and act on such of these propositions as the majority preferred. The committee, in his opinion, took the best course in reporting only on the plan committed to them. The country had a right to have the question decided whether the plan of the Executive was or was not to receive the favorable consideration of Congress. We desire (said Mr. I.) to have this question passed upon; and there seems to be no opposition to there being an immediate decision on it, but from the friends of the Executive.

Mr. TURNEY said they met there, at the extra session, when the Whig party had an overwhelming majority in both branches of Congress, and an Executive of their own choosing, and they commenced operations to pass a system of measures; and yet, at this late day, it seemed to be doubtful who was to blame for the present state of things, and for substituting the pocket of the President for a responsible treasury, in which to deposite and safely keep the public moneys! Some years ago, it was deemed a most odious proceeding, when General Jackson removed the deposites; and he was loudly denounced for it by the Whig party: but now they had themselves removed the public moneys from the security of the independent treasury to the pocket of the President. And who was blameable for it? It was said, by the friends of the President, that he was not chargeable with it; and how, then, was he to understand it?

Before the President approved the bill repealing the sub-treasury, that House had reported a bill by one of its committees, and was acting on that plan, to establish a bank of the United States. The President knew this when he signed that bill; and had he, or had he not, made up his mind at that time? for he knew that a national bank was intended to be a substitute for the sub-treasury. Or did he intend that his own pocket should be the depository for the public moneys? The President chose to approve the bill repealing the sub-treasury, and thereby released the public money from the control of law, and placed it in his own pocket. He (Mr. T.) therefore held that the President chose his own individual pocket in preference to any fiscality. And how stood the Whig party on that floor in relation to that subject? They voted to repeal the sub-treasury, and thereby placed the public money in the pocket of the President for safekeeping. And what propositions had they now? Why, they had the exchequer recommended by the President of the United States; but, it was said, that the proposition would not receive the sanction of the House. They had also the proposition of the select committee of the last session. The Whig party, having a majority in that House, had proposed a bank of the United States as their first choice. Well, that could not receive the sanction of the President of the United States, and therefore could not become law. The Whig party, then, would be forced to choose between two propositions; and they must take either the sub-treasury which had been reported by the gentleman from New Hampshire, or allow the public moneys to remain in the pocket of the President. But what did the Whig party say of the character of the President? That he was honest? That he had one drop of patriotic blood in his veins? No; not one. But, on the contrary, the whole Whig party said that this evil President ought not to be trusted by the people of the United States. Why, they denounced him as a traitor, who had sold himself and sacrificed his country on the altar of individual aggrandizement—that he was as base as base could be. That was the character given of the Whig President by the Whig party on that floor. And yet what were they about to do? They could not establish their favorite system—a bank of the United States; but they had the choice, either to leave the money in the pocket of this base individual; or to take the sub-treasury, odious as it might be to them. And which did they prefer? If they preferred the pocket of the President of the United States, they gave the lie to all they had said of the character of John Tyler, and pronounced that they did not themselves believe what they said. John Tyler was the Whig choice, base man or not; and whether he remained so, he (Mr. T.) would leave the country to judge by what now occurred. Did the Whigs then choose to keep the public money in the pocket of John Tyler as their second choice? Their first choice was a United States bank; and, failing in that, did they deem the pocket of John Tyler, without restraint or control of law, the best possible plan? The Whigs had now the opportunity to speak out, and say whether they would have the sub-treasury, or the pocket of John Tyler—believing him to be, as they asserted, a base and corrupt man. It was evident they must take one or the other horn of the dilemma. Though the sub-treasury was not their favorite scheme, yet it was free from the danger to which the other was exposed; and let them remember it was their own act which produced this state of things. They put the money in the pocket of John Tyler for disbursement and safekeeping; and would they prefer to keep it there when they knew, by two vetoes, that they could not have a United States bank? They had involved themselves in this difficulty, and they were now compelled to adopt the sub-treasury as a means of keeping the public money—a plan by which the use of the public money for the purposes of corruption was prevented; or they must acknowledge to the American people that all they had said of the baseness of John Tyler was wholly false. That was his (Mr. T.'s) view of the question as it was presented to the House; and he knew not one member of the House who had not made up his mind upon it, and upon all the other questions which were involved in the subject-matter of that discussion. John Tyler was the Whig Executive; he was made and created by them, for purposes of their own; and he was better known to them than to him (Mr. TURNEY.) John Tyler was not his (Mr. T.'s) choice, nor the choice of those whom he represented on that floor; for they had no great faith in him, nor could they comprehend him. When Gen. Jackson removed the deposites, he was charged with violating the Constitution, and Mr. Tyler was one of those who held that doctrine; but Mr. Tyler now held that a bank of the United States was unconstitutional. How, then, could General Jackson be guilty of a violation of the Constitution, by removing the deposites from an illegal and unconstitutional institution? He (Mr. T.) would leave this question for others to determine. He repeated, that Mr. Tyler was no favorite of his, nor of his constituents; but he was the favorite (or ought to be) of the Whig party, for they placed him where he is. They quarrelled, it was true; but, as it was a family quarrel, he would leave them to settle it amongst themselves.

But there was an attempt to build up a third party; and under what name? The moderate men of both parties. There was such an attempt made some years ago, when Judge White ran as of no party. Now he (Mr. T.) was of opinion that one or other of the existing great parties of the country was right; and he could not comprehend how a third division was to be made. The moderate men of both parties! Who were they? There were those who advocated a sub-treasury; and they were ultra. Therefore, this moderate party could not go with them. Then there were the bank Whigs; and they were ultra. The moderate men could not, therefore, go with them; but they must take the men who could go between the two—a sort of exchequer concern. But what was an exchequer? They had exchequer schemes reported to that House which were more odious to him than an old fashioned bank of the United States; and he felt grateful that that question was to be brought forward, for he wished to see the Whigs put their names on record in opposition to it, as some guaranty that the interests of the country were not to be destroyed by such institutions. He wished to see the Whigs committed on that question; for he had feared that, feeling themselves tumbling to pieces, they would attempt, by some such plan, to compromise with Captain Tyler. Captain Tyler was certainly no Democrat, for he preferred his pocket to a sub-treasury, which was guarded by legal punishments. But the other party said he was no Whig, because he would not sanction a United States Bank. If, then, he was neither Whig nor Democrat, he was certainly not "a moderate man of both parties," and could not, therefore, be rallied round by them. He (Mr. T.) thought it was exceedingly difficult to define a moderate man of both parties—a man who sometimes went with the Federalists, and sometimes with the Democrats, but who, at all times, abused them both.

Thus, then, it was attempted to build up a third party. But the war which had sprung up in the Whig party did not at all affect the democratic principle. It did not touch the sub-treasury. They had been told by the Whig party that the times were hard and oppressive; and that the prosperity of the country, and high prices, and public confidence must be restored by the repeal of the sub-treasury. They had repealed it; they had destroyed the Democratic policy: and had they raised the price of produce? had they increased the reward of labor? had they restored confidence in the community? had they done anything toward the accomplishment of their promises made in the late campaign? They had repealed the sub-treasury the moment they got into power, but their other promises were unredeemed; and he could not acquit Captain Tyler, and a great class of the Whig party, for repealing that law, before some substitute was provided for it. John Tyler knew that the repeal would throw the money into his own pocket, without the restraint of law; and the Whig party had allowed it to remain there, without having made any great attempts to remove it elsewhere, where it could be protected by law. Now he wished the Whigs to say in what attitude they stood before the country. Let them look back to their own speeches at the time when General Jackson removed the deposites, and then say how they could now allow the public money to remain in the pocket of a man whom they say they believe to be both base and corrupt. He (Mr. T.) believed the Whig party would say that John Tyler was by far more base and more corrupt than they had ever said General Jackson was; and yet they permitted him to retain the public money in his pocket. They would not go for the exchequer; they would not accept the sub-treasury, which they knew they could pass, and thereby guard the money by legal safeguards; and did they not, therefore, make the admission that they preferred the pocket of the base and corrupt President to any other place except the bank, which they knew they could not obtain? For himself, he should vote for the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire; and if the House did not adopt that proposition, he should consider it to be an admission of a preference of John Tyler's pocket (whence the money might be taken for corrupt and dangerous purposes) to a system restrained and governed by law.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina did not rise for the purpose of discussing the exchequer projet, more than once recommended by the President, and now reported upon unfavorably by the Committee of Ways and Means, further than to say that, in his opinion, it was by no means the most preposterous proposition that has been submitted to the consideration of the American people, since questions connected with the currency have occupied so much of their attention. Even if its merits could be demonstrated, it would probably have but little prospect of success in a Congress, almost every member of which is pledged, by his previous course, to some other proposition. He had merely risen with the intention (without entering into the discussion at length) of indicating to his constituents the course which he should probably hereafter pursue in connexion with subjects of this character.

Mr. C., as his speeches sufficiently testified, had been always favorable to a separation of the Government funds from the uses of banks; but, when that proposition, so correct in principle, had been connected with another, requiring the public dues to be collected exclusively in specie, he had invariably voted against it—believing that such a requirement was calculated to increase the pressure on the commerce of the country, already almost too great to be borne.

Since that question, however, was last agitated in Congress, a change has occurred. Bank circulation, without any oppression on the part of the Government, has gone on gradually decreasing, until, in many of the States, the circulation is reduced below the specie actually in their vaults. Under these circumstances, Mr. C. believed that the separation of the Government funds from the business of trade, even if connected with the requirement of specie, or Government credits, exclusively, in payment of the public dues, would now be accomplished, without producing a shock upon the commerce and industry of the country.

He had made these remarks, not because he expected, during the existence of the present Congress, to change his vote in relation to this subject; for having been elected by his constituents with a knowledge of his previous course, he would scarcely feel himself at liberty to do so. But he wished to indicate to them, by the remarks he had submitted, that in the event of being returned to the next Congress, he would, unless a change occurred in our monetary affairs, probably act with the Democratic party on this subject, as he had upon most others.

Mr. FILLMORE rose and inquired what would be the effect of a motion to lay the subject before the House upon the table.

The SPEAKER replied that the effect would be, that a vote of two-thirds would be required to take it up.

Mr. FILLMORE declined to make any motion.

Mr. THOMAS F. MARSHALL next obtained the floor, amid many competitors, and addressed the House at large. He desired to take this opportunity of saying that, in the action of the Committee of Ways and Means, (of which committee he was a member,) he entirely and heartily concurred. He would also remark, that his concurrence with the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject, and the vote he should give upon the exchequer—a vote which he hoped would be that of an overwhelming majority of the House—did not result, in any manner, from the source whence the proposition had emanated. If he could be induced, by any motive, to look upon the exchequer with a favorable eye, after the endorsement it had received, the open avowal that it met with the entire approbation of the American Secretary of State would have afforded him that motive and inducement. [Profound attention in all parts of the hall.] There was no man—he made the proposition broadly, and without exception—in whom, on subjects of this nature, twelve months ago, he felt so profound a confidence as the American Secretary of State. He was not one of those—and he wished to let it be known, let censure come upon him, as heretofore, from what quarter it might—who denounced the Secretary of State because he chose to remain connected with the Cabinet when the remaining members saw fit to retire. He refused then to censure the Secretary for remaining at his post. He refused now. It was a question, as Mr. Webster remarked, involving his own honor, and which, therefore, might be left to his own decision. He (Mr. M.) found nothing on which to rest a censure. The American Secretary said that he had been looked to, on account of his supposed knowledge of the subject of finance by the President elect, as one who would be a fit person to be placed at the head of the Treasury Department; and, from the knowledge which he had often displayed in this Capitol and elsewhere on such subjects, he (Mr. M.) should have said that there could not be a more competent judge than the Secretary of State.

It had been thirteen years since he first put his foot in the Capitol of the United States. It was in February, 1830, that he, for the first time, put his foot in the Senate chamber; and when he entered the lobby of the Senate, the floor was occupied by the Senator from Massachusetts, upon a question growing out of what were called and known as the Foot resolutions. He thought then, and now, that he had never seen such a man as he then saw. He had just come from the Virginia convention, where all the greatness of Virginia was assembled—where there were three generations of men, constituting the choicest spirits of the Old Dominion. He heard them all. Still, the yearning desire which he had so early formed, to look upon what he considered a great man in all respects, had not been gratified. But when he entered the lobby of the Senate chamber, and heard the Massachusetts Senator speaking upon a subject involving the true nature and genius of our institutions, and discussing the question then before the Senate with one of the most brilliant sons of the South, [Mr. Hayne,] he thought that he had, for once, looked upon a great man, in all parts and in all respects. After hearing that speech, the impression of which could never fade from his memory, he got Mr. Webster's books. He searched for every scrap which had ever fallen from him, and Mr. Webster's works were his vade mecum. Such was his enthusiastic admiration of the man and his productions, that for years he slept with his speeches under his head. He studied them over and over; and if God had vouchsafed to him any of that faculty by which one man could understand the views of another, he had it from him. If he had not mistaken the whole principles of philosophy, currency, finance, and the political organization of this Government, as laid down in those works—if he had searched those works truly—all which condemned those principles was to be found in the proposition for an exchequer.

A Government bank, with a State rights feature incorporated in it, emanating from Daniel Webster! He (Mr. M.) had seen and heard strange things since he had been a member here; but this was the strangest of all things he had ever been called on to witness! If the great Senator from Massachusetts, appointed Secretary of State by the late President (for whom all Whigs voted) to conduct the delicate and difficult negotiations appertaining to that portion of the Union whence he came, and whose confidence he enjoyed, chose to remain connected with the Cabinet in order to discharge the duty assigned to him, he (Mr. M.) admired the firmness which induced him to remain and serve his country, in spite of the denunciations hurled against him. If the great Senator—and he preferred to call him so, because it was in that character in which he first beheld him—chose to treat with scorn and contempt those who, laying it down as the law that the Cabinet should be dissolved in toto, hurled themselves against him for maintaining his post and discharging his duty, not as the retainer of any man, but with a single eye to the obligations due to his country, he (Mr. M.) would be the last to denounce him, let orders to that effect come from what quarter they might. He well knew what it was to receive orders, and to have the party scourge laid upon his free back. He admired the man who had the firmness to resist those orders;—but more of that hereafter.

The Secretary of State, in his late speech, said (and some thought sarcastically) that the motives of public men should be presumed to be pure. He (Mr. M.) would be the last person ever to presume impurity of motive against the Secretary of State. He had charged no man: he now meant to charge no man. It was no invention or argument of his own that he brought before the House. If his principles were wrong, the Secretary of State had taught them to him. On him, therefore, let the blame rest. If the ideas he advocated were "obsolete," the Secretary of State taught him what was obsolete.

By the exchequer, the Government was made to legislate under favor of the States' permission. You are to pass a law, which is to be a law, or not, according to whether it shall be permitted by State sovereignties! Here was to be a Government bank, under political direction, trading upon the revenues of the country, and ten millions besides, with a State-rights principle incorporated! Such a measure as had never been heard of before! He could never go for it. Give him the law of 1789, under which the operations of the Treasury Department were now conducted—give him the subtreasury—give him everything else, piled up on one another, rather than this exchequer.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] taunted the Committee of Ways and Means because they did not report a substitute for the exchequer. Why should they have done otherwise than pursue the course they took? Had the gentleman forgotten what he (Mr. M.) heard him say (and the gentleman would pardon him for declaring that he always listened to everything which fell from his lips with the utmost attention) when he told the House that the Whig party, which once had so much life, that he would as soon think of striking a woman, or kicking a corpse, as of attacking it? Lion-like, he turned off from the insignificance of the object.

After a few more remarks in this behalf, not distinctly heard, he proceeded as follows: "We have you hung up—suspenditur per collum—between heaven and earth, and fit for neither;" and I made bold to ask the gentleman which of the two schemes was the scheme of the President; when I was answered by him that it was that of the Secretary of State. Now, if this were true—if the gentleman had authority to speak on this subject, and tell this Congress, after the experience he had gained of the strong nature of this "fixed fact in the Constitution," that this proposition, and no other, would be taken,—why, Mr. M. would ask, should the Committee of Ways and Means be expected to report any other?

Mr. WISE said the gentleman was mistaken when he said that he had authority to speak for the Executive on that floor.

Mr. M. took it for granted that the gentleman was acquainted with the designs of the Executive on this subject of the treasury. He had heard him say that he might be waked up at any hour of the night, and he would tell at once what John Tyler would do in regard to a bank of the United States. He had also heard him say to the Whig party that they should have this measure, and no other. Surely, the gentleman did not mean to say that his word was law to the House. He did not refer to his own power, when he spoke in that authoritative tone. Knowing the stubborn nature of the veto—and, by-the-by, he approved of that power in the Constitution—he could, of course, only suppose that he referred to the action of the Executive, and spoke by authority. But why should the Committee of Ways and Means report anything else? To get another veto? Did the gentleman wish to place the Congress of the United States again in this predicament? Who did not remember the charges made against the Whig party at the last session—and for which he had no doubt they were condemned by the people—of legislating for the purpose of catching vetoes? Why, then, (said Mr. M.) should we report another plan, or amend this? The Secretary of State had said, "Don't change this thing." He knew his skill, and the tools he had used, and that it would work well. "Don't, therefore, (said he,) alter it in the least; but give us the thing we have sent you, and I pledge"—Oh! what a pledge—"I pledge my reputation that it will work well." Why, then, (said Mr. M.) should we report another bill, and get another veto? for another veto is inevitable if we do it.

He had been charged in that House and out of the House with being inclined to surrender to Mr. Tyler the independence of Congress upon the subject of the clause in relation to the public lands that was stricken out of the tariff bill (as he said) upon his motion, (though there seemed to be some obscurity upon that question.) When that question came up, as his own honor was involved, he would have that question explained. When that subject came up, it would be found whether he was inclined to surrender, so far as he was concerned, the independence of the legislative branch of the Government to the Executive power.

On that question he differed honestly with some of the most distinguished men of his party; but here emphatically was a question of a surrender of the privileges of the House of Representatives. We have (said Mr. M.) sent plan after plan to the Executive, and they have been vetoed; we have been told that any law on this subject, according with our principles, will be vetoed; we have been told that the legislative will on this subject must submit, and that we must take the law, and every letter of it, from the Executive. This was not a question of the veto power. Not at all. It was not here the question, whether, because the Executive vetoes a law, the Constitution shall be changed. Not at all. The question was, whether the Legislature should take the law draughted by the Executive, with every i dotted and every t crossed, or get no law at all.

Must they take the law as it came from him, and have no power to amend it? That was the question; and let it be expressly understood, that if the exchequer bill were passed by this Congress, it would be passed contrary to the principles of both parties. Dared he to vote upon a principle like this? Dared he to legislate under the dictation of the President of the United States? That Capitol might crumble to ruin over his head—the commerce of the country might suffer ten thousand fold more than it was now suffering, ere he would lend himself to any such proceeding. It was a question of liberty itself; and yet gentlemen were exceedingly anxious that the measure should pass.

He (Mr. MARSHALL) would probably have another opportunity, before the 4th of March next, to continue his speech. He desired this to be understood as merely the exordium of the speech which he intended to make. [A laugh.] He had a great variety of matters to discourse upon, a great many things to say in relation to his course in Congress, and in relation to his very peculiar position, which he intended to define exactly. [A laugh.] The gentlemen connected with the Administration on that floor were extremely anxious that this measure should pass. They had had a tolerably distinct announciation upon this subject, the other day, from the gentleman from Massachusetts.

He (Mr. M.) had suffered so much from misrepresentation himself, that he would not willingly misrepresent any human being. He had not read the gentleman's reported speech; but he had heard at least three-fourths of it. He considered it as being a sort of half-jest, half-earnest affair—one that might be taken either way. He did not understand the gentleman as announcing upon that floor, by authority of the President, that any one who expected to get office under John Tyler must vote for this bill. But he certainly did understand the gentleman to say that the Whig party were as dead as a stone; that they had butted their brains out against the constitutional question; and that the Administration had thrown them off. He understood it to be, on the part of the President and his administration, a distinct and final repudiation of the Whig party. The gentleman had announced one fact—which would, he feared, be found to be a fact, and a melancholy one—that there was now in the United States no man of sufficiently commanding character and patriotism—no man who, by his name and weight of character alone, could rally around him, as around a common centre, any party in this country. The gentleman had also declared that the proceedings of that body were but a continual struggle between a number of gentlemen in that House, whose name was Legion, and the President of the United States; and that, among this numerous host, there was not a single individual of such standing and stability as to draw with him the support of a party. That the Democrats, divided as they now were, were in very great danger, by means of the "constitutional fact," (against which the Whigs had butted their brains out,) to be placed in precisely the same fix. For there stood the same "constitutional fact," and there stood the great party who had been signally discomfited, and there was another great party soon to be put hors du combat. The ring was to be cleared. [A laugh.] He did not know who those gentlemen were whose name was Legion; he had no doubt they could easily be distinguished by the gentleman. Though they were marked as distinctly as the little sheep so pathetically described by the gentleman from New York—though rejected and driven from the fold—no one could blame them for casting a few wistful glances towards those they had left; and he had a sort of hope that, amid the divisions on the other side, and in the exultation which an overwhelming majority was so apt to inspire—believing, as they did, that the Whigs were dead—stone-dead—some of these days they might again look up, and recover their former standing. The gentleman from Massachusetts apparently desired to settle this great question for Congress, leaving them no ground to stand upon.

It would, however, all thought, be a queer state of things to see a union between Mr. Tyler, Mr. Webster, and the Postmaster General. He spoke not now of the other members of the Cabinet, for he did not know them so well; he would not name the gentleman from Maine. But to unite either the Northern or Southern interest with John Tyler—my conscience, what a coalition it would be! If this should take place, and the gentleman from Virginia should be found amongst them, would he ever say anything more on that floor about coalition?

A strange sight to see Mr. Van Buren associated with Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Webster! [A laugh.] But enough of this: let the Democracy stick to their principles, and leave the Whig party to take care of themselves. The principles they once held were right: let them stick to their principles, and let the others stick to theirs; let the Administration go on as it chose, it would be over in a little time; and, in his opinion, when it was over, and the history of this country came to be written, this Administration—for some of the members of which he felt the highest respect—would be a sort of parenthesis, [a laugh,] which, on looking into the grammar books, would be found to be a passage which might be left out without injury to the sense. [Prolonged laughter.]

He (Mr. M.) had held on to the Administration as long as he possibly could, as a Whig Administration; and he was one who believed that Mr. Tyler, although he had been called a traitor, and denounced for having deserted his party, honestly and sincerely disagreed in judgment, and entertained opposite sentiments from those of a majority of the Whig party. He believed Mr. Tyler to be a lower Virginian of the later platonic school. [A laugh.] He had never entertained the idea of Mr. Tyler being an out-and-out Whig, from the moment of Gen. Harrison's death. Mr. Tyler, if he knew anything of his history, was once a Jacksonman, and quitted the Administration party on account of the difficulties which grew out of the questions of State rights and of Nullification. Mr. Tyler was a Jacksonman when he (Mr. M.) was in opposition to Gen. Jackson's policy, and he was against Gen. Jackson when he (Mr. M.) was on his side.

He was not at the Harrisburg convention, but he had swallowed the ticket agreed upon by the Whig party; he had taken it all down. Out of Congress, he always did whatever the Whigs told him. [A laugh.] And he would do so in Congress, if there was not a higher obligation resting upon him. With a certain class of politicians—politicians of the strict constructionist school—a passage from an old letter of Mr. Jefferson, of but three lines separated from the context, was of higher obligation than the Constitution itself. He never supposed that Mr. Tyler would give his assent to any bank system, until he saw the message which recommended this exchequer plan. Never, until then, had he any hope that the President would sign any bank bill. Whenever he heard Virginia politicians talking about the law of the land, and about the opinions of the fathers of that school of politics, he confessed that he always got scared. But the new doctrine went still farther. The older politicians, if he understood them, never held such doctrine. They were strict constructionists, to be sure; but they never held that the power to incorporate a bank was unconstitutional because no such power was delegated by the Constitution. What was the doctrine they now heard? That the powers of this Government were supreme, absolute, and irresistible within the ten miles square; and that a law passed by Congress might be extended to the States, by the assent of the State Legislatures; or, in other words, a law might be passed by compact between the General Government and the State Legislatures; and the Senator from Massachusetts had endorsed that doctrine. He had not been aware of the existence of this doctrine until within a few months; and yet, it appeared, it was one of the peculiar doctrines of this Administration.

He had never heard the Democratic party take this ground, and on this point he and the Democratic party agreed. Some of the Democratic party, indeed, held that the incorporation of a national bank was improper, as it gave an undue preference to individuals; that it made undue discrimination, giving to the stockholders the use of the public moneys, and placing them in a better condition than all other people. In this particular he and they differed; but would they, holding such doctrine, come forward now and give their support to a government bank of this description? He thought they would not.

Whether the Whig party would ever come into power again, or not, was only for Him who held the issues of life and death to determine; he thought it exceedingly probable that, whether they did or not, he would not be permitted any longer to remain in their ranks; he would not be permitted to bear arms, and to do battle in their ranks; but whether they rose or fell, it was in their power at least to fall with dignity.

The Democratic party, he believed, felt themselves strong enough to succeed in their own measures without assistance. They had seen these gentlemen, whose name was Legion, dash their brains out against this fixed constitutional fact—out of revenge, probably, for having elected a President of the United States who was of a different creed in politics. Cæsar had fallen in the capitol, and fallen at the very base of Pompey's statue. There they lie disabled, and now they want Democracy to take them by the hand and raise them up. But Democracy says no! we will not help you, for we do not like you. We are not responsible for your disasters.

Had it come to this? Had the gentleman from Massachusetts authority to make such a proposition—to announce that Mr. Webster offers his name and his vast influence in favor of a Democratic candidate for the Presidency, whether he comes from the North or from the South, and to establish a Government bank, based on the public revenue, to be conducted by commissioners, bound by no responsibility save to the throne, and with the doctrine of State rights stuck in the middle of the system?

Here Mr. M. was interrupted—his hour having expired; but, before resuming his seat, he gave notice that he would, at the earliest opportunity, resume and continue his speech. No matter what the subject of debate might be, he intended to go right through with what he had to say. If gentlemen chose to be boisterous, he would imitate their example; and he believed he could use the lash as severely as they could.

Mr. PROFFIT then obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. WM. W. IRWIN, who moved an adjournment; but the yeas and nays being called for, and ordered,

Mr. IRWIN, after two or three names had been called, by general consent withdrew his motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. FILMORE's motion to print the two reports, and carried; leaving the motion to print the extra number of copies open.

On motion by Mr. WM. W. IRWIN,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 10, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem laid before the Senate a communication from the State Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 13th December, further information as to the operations of the bankrupt law; which, on motion of Mr. EVANS, was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and ordered to be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, a report made to the Treasury Department by the district attorney of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, in relation to the cloth cases, in which an attempt was made to defraud the revenue.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved that the report be laid on the table, and printed. He would just say, that if, after the report was printed, and examined by him, it should turn out to be the document asked for, he would move for the printing of an additional number of copies; for those frauds on the revenue should be spread before the country, exposed, and put a stop to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN inquired whether the communication there made was not in relation to one of those cases now in litigation, and pending before one of the courts of the United States.

Mr. BUCHANAN said it was possible that some one of the many cases might now be pending before the courts, though he did not know that there was. It was his belief that there had been about forty trials of those cases before the courts and jury in the city of Philadelphia. They were all decided in favor of the United States; and all related to a subject which it was not his wish to discuss until he saw this report. But when it was presented, it would be found that the time had arrived when it was necessary to take some decisive action on the subject.

Mr. CRITTENDEN had no objection to the mode of action the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposed for himself; but a communication was made to him that some of those cases were now depending before the courts.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked, that if any of those cases were depending before the courts, they had been carried up to the Supreme Court on a writ of error; though he did not know that such was the case.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said, if the cases reported to the Senate were depending in the Supreme Court, it was not proper to publish the report until those cases were decided finally. When cases were undergoing trial in the court which was sitting under their chamber, it would not be proper to make a publication which might have effect on their decision. He understood, furthermore, that the parties believed that it was intended to prejudice these cases now pending, by getting up a debate in the Senate on them. He did not wish the Senator from Pennsylvania to understand that he would, for a moment, entertain an idea that he would be capable of such an act. He did not believe that he was capable of doing anything of the kind; for he knew that if the Senator from Pennsylvania believed that any of these cases were depending before the court below, it would be far from his purpose to say or do anything that might prejudice them. It was the impression of the parties concerned, that there was some person of less consequence moving in an underhand manner to prejudice the trials, by bringing about a debate in the Senate while the cases were pending.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Senator did him no more than justice, when he asserted that he would be incapable of doing anything which would prejudice a case which might be under judicial investigation before the Supreme Court of the United States; but even if any of these cases were there, (a fact of which he was not aware,) how, on the face of the earth, he would ask, could the printing of this report prejudice those cases? The report, as he understood, disclosed the means by which foreign importers committed frauds upon the revenue of this country. It was a question of law merely. It would be for the Committee on Printing to decide, under all the circumstances, whether the report should be printed. He knew nothing of its contents, except what had been stated to him by others; he only knew that it emanated from a most respectable source. It had been suggested to him that some legislation might be necessary to counteract those frauds which he had referred to; and he had merely asked for the printing of the report, that it might be examined by the Senate.

The report was then ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting statements from the incorporated banks in the District of Columbia, showing the state of their affairs at the close of the year 1842; which, on motion of Mr. MILLER, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, transmitting, in conformity with the 20th section of the act of Congress of 26th August, 1842, a statement showing the expenditures out of the contingent fund of that department for the year ending 30th of September, 1842; which was, on motion of Mr. BAYARD, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 23d ultimo, giving information of the number of pensions for disability which have been paid to seamen, or privates of the marine corps, since the passage of the act of August, 1841, &c.; which, on motion of Mr. BAYARD, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting, in compliance with a resoluof the Senate of the 30th ultimo, a statement showing at what offices public sales of lands have been held since the 4th of September, 1841, (being the date of the passage of the distribution act,) and the total amount of money received at such sales, and what amount was paid over the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, &c.; which was, on motion of Mr. McROBERTS, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented four memarials from most respectable farmers of the State of Kentucky, praying for the appointment of an agency for the purchase of hemp; and urging the propriety of having it manufactured there for the use of the navy of the United States: referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CHOATE presented a memorial from merchants and others of the city of Boston, praying indemnity for spoliations committed by the French prior to 1800: ordered to lie on the table, with the bill on that subject.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of William Dupuyster and Henry M. Cruger; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, with an amendment, the bill to extend the time of payment of the judgments against the Planters' Bank of Mississippi, and the Agricultural Bank of Mississippi, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARROW, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing an examination and survey of the harbor of Memphis, Tennessee; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which the memorial of the corporate authorities of the town of Alexandria on the subject had been referred, reported a bill to amend the charter of the town of Alexandria; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. M. also, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an adverse report on the petition of Daniel Murray, the surviving partner of Murray & Spencer; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. M. also, on leave, reported a bill for repaving and repairing Pennsylvania avenue, in Washington city; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KERR, on leave, introduced a bill to extend the Patent office to 9th street; which was read twice, and referred.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of a memorial from the city of New York, asking Congress to adopt the plan for a board of exchequer; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of Richard H. Wilde, praying that the benefits of the copyright law may be extended to a work which he is about to publish in Europe first, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred—

"A BILL to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson for damage sustained in the discharge of his official duty.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, directed to ascertain the amount of the penalty or damages awarded by the district judge of the United States at New Orleans, in the year eighteen hundred and fifteen, against Major General Andrew Jackson, then commander-in-chief of that district, for official acts in that capacity, and paid by him at that time; and that the sum so paid, with interest at six per cent. per annum, be paid to Major General Andrew Jackson, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

made the following report:

'The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson for damage sustained in the discharge of his official duty, beg leave to submit the following report:

'The bill has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, after having been made a special order in the Senate, and after having undergone discussion there. It has been so referred generally, and without specifying the particular points of inquiry, which were contemplated by the Senate in ordering the reference. The whole subject having been thus referred to their examination, with all the interesting questions which it includes, perhaps it may be considered to be the duty of the committee, as the organ of the Senate in the preparatory examination of legal subjects, to examine and report on those connected with the object of this reference.

"Yet, in the absence of any specific instructions from the Senate, and looking to the discussions which have led to the reference of the bill, the committee have come to the conclusion that they will best fulfil their duty to the Senate by reporting it with an amendment, placing the restoration of the fine imposed on General Jackson, by Judge Hall, on grounds which do not involve any censure of either of the parties in this by-gone transaction, nor in any degree arraign the conduct of the patriotic citizens of New Orleans; but simply protect the Senate from the possible inference that, in passing this bill, it has acknowledged the legal authority of a military officer to establish martial law within the limits of this free republic. They accordingly report the bill with an amendment.

"Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert—

"That, in consideration of the distinguished military services of Major General Andrew Jackson, in the defence of the city of New Orleans, and of the desire expressed by sundry citizens and Legislatures of this Union, in divers petitions and legislative resolutions submitted to the Congress of the United States, the fine of $1,000 imposed upon Major General Andrew Jackson by the Hon. Dominick A. Hall, be, and the same is hereby, restored; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to Major General Andrew Jackson the said sum of $1,000, with interest at six per cent. thereon, from the day of its payment by him, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"Also, strike out the title of the bill, and insert 'A bill for the relief of Major General Andrew Jackson.'"

Mr. WALKER, from the same committee, read the following; which he submitted to the Senate as a minority report, viz:

"The undersigned, one of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate of the United States, to whom was referred the bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in the discharge of his official duty, dissents from the views of the majority of the committee in this case. The bill referred to the committee contains no censure of the conduct or motives of Judge Hall, nor does it express any opinion as to the acts of the citizens of New Orleans. It leaves all those subjects untouched, to depend upon the judgment of the present age and of posterity. The bill, should it become a law, will be only an expression of the legislative will, that, under all the circumstances of the case, the money paid by Gen. Jackson in discharge of his fine, and now retained in the treasury of the United States, should be refunded. Such a bill arraigns and censures no one. But the report of the committee, by the clearest implication, in the opinion of the undersigned, does arraign the conduct of General Jackson in this case as subversive of the Constitution of the United States. The case does not necessarily involve the power of a military commander to "establish martial law within the limits of this free republic" This question, however, having been introduced by the committee, the undersigned submits that, in time of war, and of imminent public danger, it may be the duty of the commander to arrest those regarded as traitors, spies, or mutineers, within the limits of his camp; especially in cases where it was obvious to him that his refusal to exercise such power would involve the disbanding of his forces, the defeat of his army, and the surrender of that army and of the country which he was bound to defend. The alternative, as he fully believed, was to make the arrest, or the abandonment of his country's standard, and the surrender of one of her greatest cities, to a powerful enemy, whose motto of victory involved indiscriminate plunder and licentious outrage. Under such circumstances, should he make the arrest and save the country? To this question there will be but one response from the heart of every true American patriot. That General Jackson, and those united with him in the defence of New Orleans, fully believed this emergency to exist, is beyond all doubt or controversy. If, then, this was the state of the case, it was the duty of General Jackson to have made the arrest; and the act was not merely excusable, but justifiable. It was demanded by a great and overruling necessity; and had he failed to assume this responsibility, and the consequences which he anticipated had occurred, he would have merited and received universal execration. Such being the facts, was General Jackson bound to liberate the prisoner, immediately upon the mandate of the Federal judge of that district? If, as Gen. Jackson believed, the danger was still imminent—that the liberation at that time of the prisoner would overthrow his power, and bring his authority as commander into contempt—that it would surely produce a repetition of similar acts of mutiny and treason, and demonstrate his inability to restrain, much less to punish them—that it would lead to the depopulation or defeat of his army, and the surrender of the city he was bound to defend; the same overruling necessity which justified the arrest, would require the detention of the prisoner until the emergency had passed, and he could be surrendered with safety into the hands of the civil authority. The law which justified the act, was the great law of necessity; it was the law of self-defence. This great law of necessity—of defence of self, of home, and of country—never was designed to be abrogated by any statute, or by any constitution. This was the law which justified the arrest and detention of the prisoner; and, however the act may now be assailed, it has long since received the cordial approbation of the American people. That General Jackson never desired to elevate the military above the civil authority, is proved by his conduct during the trial, and after the imposition of this fine. When the magistrate ascended to the bench—acting for no contempt in the presence of the court—acting in his own case as prosecutor, witness, accuser, and judge; when the General's answer was refused to be heard, and he was denied a trial by jury; when a victorious army, and a rescued and grateful people, thronged the court, the terrified Judge was about to adjourn the court without inflicting the sentence.—General Jackson rose; he quieted the threatened tumult; requested the Judge to proceed; the sentence was imposed; he bowed, in a calm and dignified submission to the mandate of the law, and paid, at once, the penalty inflicted for saving the country. And when, upon retiring from the court, he was surrounded by a grateful and indignant people, his brief, but glorious address was an appeal to all who heard him to respect the civil tribunals, and maintain the supremacy of the law. And now the question is, shall this penalty, thus incurred in discharge of a solemn duty, and thus paid, be paid, or refunded? The title is, "A bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in the discharge of his official duty." The title is in strict conformity with the facts of the case, and, in the opinion of the undersigned, should be retained. The committee, however, propose to reject it, and to substitute, as a title, "A bill for the relief of General Andrew Jackson." General Jackson has never solicited, nor will he ever receive, such relief. He is no mendicant; he asks no alms, or pension, or bounty, from his country: but that country itself demands that this money shall be refunded as an act of justice. It was a penalty incurred for saving the country, and the country requires that it shall be restored. Nor is the undersigned prepared to give the reasons assigned in the bill for refunding this money. The bill places the restoration of the penalty mainly upon the "consideration of the distinguished military services of General Jackson." This bill is not a payment for services, however great or meritorious. These services are being paid in the approbation of his conscience and of his country, in the glorious result of his immortal victories on a frontier saved from savage fury and from indiscriminate massacre, in the rescue of New Orleans and the reconquest of Louisiana and of its noble river; paid in closing our late eventful struggle with glory and renown; paid in the highest honors and offices which a grateful people could bestow; and, through ages to come, posterity will continue the payment in gratitude and praise, re-echoed by countless millions throughout this great republic, and in every country and in every land where our principles shall go on, conquering and to conquer, striking down the thrones of despots, and erecting upon their ruins the glorious fabric of the people's will. And are these the services which it is now proposed to compensate by the payment of this paltry sum, in a bill for the relief of General Andrew Jackson? It is not a bill for relief, but for indemnity; not a payment for services, but a restoration of money unjustly withheld; and in no other view can it receive the support of

"R. J. WALKER."

Mr. BERRIEN moved that the report of the committee, and the bill, as amended, be printed; which motion was put, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the report of the minority of the committee was ordered to be printed, and appended to the report of the majority.

Mr. LINN moved that 20,000 copies extra be printed of both reports.

Mr. EVANS remarked, that that motion would lie over, under the rule, for the present.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana was understood to say that it seemed to him that the motion was not then in order, as the question of printing the report was disposed of. They had that moment ordered the reports to be printed; consequently, this was a new and independent motion, which would have to go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BAYARD said the motion would have to go to the Committee on Printing.

The CHAIR was understood to say that the views of the minority were not, strictly speaking, a report; and not being such, the motion to print should properly have been referred to the Committee on Printing; but there being no objection at the time, the question was put on the motion to print, and decided in the affirmative without dissent; which was tantamount to a unanimous vote.

Mr. LINN remarked, that the question was now on ordering an additional quantity to be printed. The motion to print the usual quantity, as a report, was already decided; and the question could not be revived, without it was strictly a report, in the sense of the rule. The Senate having decided by that vote that it was a report, the question to print an additional quantity was exempted for the operation of the rule which required the motion to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The CHAIR was understood to say that, as a report, it was not necessary to refer the motion to print to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EVANS said there was no objection to printing the usual quantity of a report; but, the motion to print an additional quantity being an independent resolution, must lie over one day, under the rule.

Mr. BUCHANAN suggested to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] to let the motion lie over till to-morrow, and call for the yeas and nays on the motion to print; for it was evident that no bill would pass this session to indemnify General Jackson.

Mr. LINN modified his motion to 10,000 copies, instead of 20,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN supposed the Senator from Missouri could get over all the difficulty by letting it lie over till to-morrow morning, when it would not be necessary to ask for the unanimous consent to pass upon the motion.

Mr. LINN yielded to the suggestion; and the motion was laid over till to-morrow.

Several bills from the House were then read twice, and referred to appropriate committees.

The following resolution, introduced by Mr. BARROW, was taken up and adopted, viz:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate why the appropriation made by Congress, at the last session, for Fort Livingston, in the State of Louisiana, has been withheld from the officer superintending the construction of that work; and, also, by virtue of what law, or by whose authority, said appropriation was withheld; and whether the appropriation has been expended on any of the military defences of the country; and, also, that he inform the Senate whether the completion of Fort Livingston is not indispensably necessary to the military defence of New Orleans."

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. CONRAD yesterday, was taken up and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act, entitled "An act respecting the organization of the army, and for other purposes," passed August 23, 1842, as provides that the second regiment of dragoons shall, from and after the 4th day of March next, be converted into a regiment of riflemen.

OREGON BILL.

The CHAIR announced the unfinished business of yesterday—the bill authorizing the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon. The pending question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LINN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CALHOUN inquired if there was not a proposition pending at the adjournment yesterday?

Mr. BAYARD observed that he had had some idea yesterday of presenting an amendment which would obviate the difficulty now likely to impede the passage of the bill; but at that stage of the proceedings it could be adopted only by unanimous consent. Since then, he had thought more about the matter, and should now decline moving the amendment. It was one of the most delicate and difficult questions to touch upon. There was no doubt as to the propriety of encouraging our citizens to settle in that country, nor as to the propriety of establishing fortifications; but as to making appropriations of portions of the territory, what had been said by the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, had placed the subject in a very strong light. As, under existing arrangements, the territory was to be used in common for the purposes of trade, the question which now arose was, whether they could, with any propriety, under the existing relations between this Government and Great Britain, adopt such a bill as this, unless the provision regarding the grants of land to settlers be stricken out. If that portion of the bill were stricken out, he (Mr. B) would, with great cheerfulness, vote for the establishment of fortifications. He would not, however, at present, offer any amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that the Senate, from some cause or other, was exceedingly thin—too much so, he thought, to permit the question to be taken at present. He had waited in expectation that other views than his would be stated; but it appeared that no one at present was inclined to continue the debate. His wish was to reply to any objections which might be offered in relation to what he had said on the subject yesterday; being entitled, as he thought, to close the debate. He was anxious, too, that the few remarks which he intended to make in conclusion should be heard by the whole Senate; he would move, therefore, (and he hoped the motion would meet the concurrence of the Senate,) that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow.

It was accordingly postponed.

Senate bill No. 34, providing for ascertaining and disposing of the lead-mineral lands in the States of Illinois and Arkansas, and Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, and for other purposes, was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, observed that he would offer two sets of amendments; one set proposed by himself, on the part of the committee, and the other suggested by the Secretary of War; but with regard to which he would merely state his opinion, leaving the Senate to act upon them. Mr. S. then explained the amendments he recommended, many of which were merely verbal alterations. One was to extend the time for entry at the minimum price, after the lots were offered for public sale, from two to three years. Another was to substitute the words "mineral lands" for "lead mines."

All the amendments recommended by the committee were adopted.

Mr. S. then submitted the amendments suggested by the Secretary of War.

One was, to include with lead minerals, "or ores of copper and zinc." Another, to increase the minimum price at which the lands were to be offered at public sale, from $5 to $10.

Mr. SMITH stated that he did not approve of these amendments, but would leave the matter with the Senators from Illinois and the Senate.

Mr. YOUNG stated that there were strong objections to both. As to copper and zinc, he knew of no mines of that nature in Illinois. He believed, some years ago, a copper mine was opened within the border of Wisconsin, which at first, it was supposed, would realize considerable profit; and he understood good prices were obtained for the land in consequence of it. But the speculation was subsequently found unprofitable, and it came to nothing. As to the increase of price, it would be most injurious. He would rather see the price reduced from $5.

Mr. SMITH concurred with the Senator from Illinois, that the amendments ought not to be adopted. He thought the price of the lands for public sale sufficiently high, under all the circumstances. There might be instances in which $100, or $50 an acre, would not be too much; but, in the great mass of cases, $5 would be found a sufficiently high average. The House of Representatives had, indeed, set it down much lower—at $2 50; which was doubled by the Senate.

Mr. YOUNG explained, that, in nine cases out of ten, the lots bought on speculation as mineral lands were finally turned into mere farming lots, and the pursuit of minerals was given up as too unprofitable. It was not more than one in ten of those speculations that made money.

Mr. McROBERTS concurred with his colleague, and objected to those amendments.

Mr. SMITH said he should not, of course, press the amendments, as they were not approved of by the Senators from Illinois, who understood the subject so well.

Mr. CALHOUN made a suggestion, that perhaps it would be proper to fix the minimum price for public sale much higher than at present; and then to make a rapid reduction for private entry. It was understood that, for some mineral lots, $100 an acre would not be too much. An opportunity might be given to obtain, by competition, at public sale, as high a price as possible; and, if the lots were not disposed of at public sale, they could be passed rapidly into private hands, at the minimum price fixed by the bill. He merely made the suggestion.

Mr. YOUNG asked the Senators from Missouri what price the mineral lands of that State were sold for?

He was answered that they were sold for the ordinary price of $1 25 per acre.

After a few more observations from Messrs. YOUNG, SMITH, WOODBURY, and LINN, the two amendments were negatived.

Mr. YOUNG submitted a few amendments; some of which were adopted, and some negatived.

The bill was reported back to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in. It was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The CHAIR announced the special orders of the day.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana hoped the Senate would indulge him by allowing the Senate bill No. 41 to be taken up. It was a bill for the relief of a widow, who had, by mistake, made a wrong entry of an 80-acre lot in Missouri.

The Senate assenting, the bill was taken up, entitled "A bill for the relief of Elizabeth Monroe;" and was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

As the first of the special orders, the bill for the relief of William De Buys, postmaster at New Orleans, was taken up, and considered as in committee of the whole; but no amendment being offered, it was reported back; and on the question of ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. KING asked for some explanation as to its being in conformity with the purpose and objects of the law of 1840, regulating the salaries and emoluments of postmasters.

Mr. CONRAD said he would read part of the act of 1840, which did; and then he explained that the postmaster of New Orleans was entitled to the maximum salary allowed by the act—$5,000—on the ground that the commission on the receipts of the office would amount to more, if that was not the limited sum. In 1841, in consequence of the removal of the office to a more convenient location for the public, and other expenses, the postmaster was out of pocket $650; that is, he did not receive the full salary, which was deficient that sum. The object of the bill was to allow him to repay himself out of the box rents.

The bill, without further opposition, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The other special orders of the day were postponed; and the following Senate and House bills were taken up, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Senate bill 53, for the relief of Wareham Kingsley.

House bill 567, for the relief of Snow Y. Sears.

House bill 511, for the relief Joshua Drew.

Senate bill 60, to re-enact and continue in operation the several acts now in force for the relief of insolvent debtors of the United States, was taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. BERRIEN explained that this was an extension of the act already in existence, for three years longer. It had been reported in conformity with the recommendation of the Treasury Department.

Mr. BENTON adverted to the anomaly presented by this bill. It came from the same committee which had reported in favor of a bankrupt law which was to annul the insolvent laws of the States of this Union. The insolvent laws of the States were set at naught, and attempted to be quashed by a bankrupt law, which itself was nothing but a great insolvent law for the abolition of debts. This bill, too, is for the relief of insolvent debtors. Mr. B. showed how bankruptcy and insolvency were identified both by the committee and the judiciary. He referred to Judge Story's opinions, and showed how inconsistent they were with the definition of bankruptcy as laid down by English jurists, particularly Judge Blackstone.

After an extensive review of the whole subject of bankruptcy and insolvency, Mr. B. concluded by saying he had not risen to oppose the present bill, (for he did not know anything about it till it came up,) but to point out the anomaly of the same committee that recommended a bankrupt law to expunge the insolvent laws of the States, now bringing forward a law for the relief of the insolvent debtors of the United States.

Mr. BERRIEN explained that this was a bill to enable the Treasury Department to permit debtors to the United States, in certain cases, to take the benefit of an insolvent law.

Mr. CHOATE eulogized and defended the character of Judge Story, and explained what he conceived that judge's expressions amounted to, as to cases of insolvency being admissible in a constitutional bankrupt law adapted to this country.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. BENTON and BERRIEN; and, at Mr. WOODBURY'S request, the communication from the Treasury Department requiring a re-enactment of the law was read.

Mr. WOODBURY conceived that the bankrupt law, if continued, would reach to all the cases necessary; if it was repealed, the re-enactment of this law would be proper. As long as the bankrupt law was in existence, this renewal of the insolvent law was unnecessary.

Mr. HENDERSON was of the same opinion. Debtors to the United States could be discharged under the bankrupt law, which makes provision for such cases.

Mr. BERRIEN observed that there were many cases which could not be disposed of, unless this bill was passed; for instance, cases of custom-house bonds

Mr. WOODBURY assured the Senator that, since the passage of the bankrupt law, debtors to the United States had resorted to it in preference to the insolvent law, because it was cheaper. He suggested that this bill might be laid over till the end of the session. It would by that time be known what was to be done with the bankrupt law.

Mr. BERRIEN would have no objection to the postponement, were it not that it was considered necessary the bill should be passed, to meet cases which otherwise could not be disposed of. It was a beneficent law, and could do no harm.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

On motion of Mr. BATES, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. BARTON presented the following petitions:

One of several hundred citizens of Jefferson and Berkeley counties, Va., remonstrating against military rule over the armory at Harper's Ferry.

Mr. ATHERTON, under the rule, presented the petition of Elisha Morrill, attorney of John Peters and Sarah Farnum, for title to land.

Mr. CROSS presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, asking an appropriation for the completion of a road partially constructed by the United States, from Red river to the southern boundary of Missouri.

Mr. C. gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill to be entitled An act to authorize the Governor of Arkansas to select six sections of land for the use of salines, under the sixth proposition of the act for the admission of said State into the Union.

Mr. STOKELY presented the petition of Joseph L. Righter, Jonathan T. Updegraff, and 82 men; and of Jane Robinson and Elizabeth Heaton, and 97 women of Mount Pleasant, in Ohio, against the annexation of Texas, and the admission of any new slave State, and of any abridgment of the right of petition: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of Wm. Robinson, Isaac Waterman, and 72 other men; and of Julia Ann Job, Rebecca T. Updegraff, and 82 other women; for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and the Territories of the United States, and the domestic slave trade: rejected under the 21st rule.

Also, the petition of the same persons against any more of the public revenue paid by the free States being expended in carrying on the war in Florida, or in the settlement of Florida: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDWARDS of Missouri gave notice that he would introduce a bill allowing a reasonable time to the register and receiver of the land office in the Platte land district, in Missouri, to adjust the pre-emption claims in said district, before the lands were offered at public sale.

Mr. REYNOLDS presented the joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, praying the remission of a fine of $1,000, which was unjustly imposed on General Jackson in 1815, at New Orleans. Said resolution requests the delegation in Congress from Illinois to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law to effect the above object.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FILLMORE asked leave to report sundry bills from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. EVERETT objected; but, after some conversation, withdrew his objection.

Mr. FILLMORE then reported a bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for the half calendar year ending on the 30th June, 1843, and for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1844: read twice, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and (together with the accompanying papers) ordered to be printed.

Also, reported a bill making appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various tribes of Indians, and for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the half calendar year ending June 30th, 1843, and for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1844: read twice, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Also reported, from the same committee, a bill making appropriations for pensions for the half calendar year ending June 30th, 1843, and for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1844: read twice, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY said that at the last session a joint resolution (No. 13) reported by himself was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. As this resolution related to certain treaty stipulations, which were about to expire by limitation, and as it was important that it should be decided this session, he moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from its further consideration; and, in order that the House might take action upon it, he also moved that it be made the special order for this day week.

Mr. TALIAFERRO inquired if the motion was in order?

The SPEAKER said, No.

Mr. TALIAFERRO hoped that the regular order of business would be observed.

Mr. EVERETT inquired what was the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER said, after the committees were called on for reports, the business of the morning hour (General Jackson's fine) would come up.

Mr. EVERETT said he should object to every species of business whatever, until the question of the repeal of the bankrupt law should have been decided.

Mr. KENNEDY still insisting on his motion,

Mr. TALIAFERRO withdrew his objection; which was renewed by Mr. EVERETT.

Mr. KENNEDY then moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MERIWETHER called for the reading of the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, whenever he shall deem it compatible with the public interest, to make known to the Governments of Denmark, Sweden, the Hanseatic Republics, Prussia, Austria, and Russia, in conformity with the stipulations of the existing commercial treaties between said Governments and the United States, the desire and intention of this Government to terminate such commercial treaties now in force between said Governments and the United States as have contracted to allow the parties thereto to import on equal terms, as regards duties on merchandise and tonnage, each into the ports of the other, goods, wares, and merchandise, other than those of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the nation in whose vessels the same are borne.

"SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That, in all future negotiations which may be opened with the aforesaid Governments, or with any other, it is the policy of the United States to confine the privilege of reciprocal importation on equal terms as to goods and shipping, to goods, wares, and merchandise the product of the countries from whence and in whose ships they are imported, or the product of such contiguous countries thereto as usually carry on their foreign commerce through the ports of the same."

Mr. CUSHING inquired whether the gentleman [Mr. J. P. KENNEDY] proposed to leave another resolution reported at the same session, in relation to our trade with Great Britain, and still before the Committee of the Whole, unacted on.

Mr. KENNEDY said he was not aware that the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] was before the Committee of the Whole. He supposed the gentleman referred to his report on colonial trade. He (Mr. K.) was willing to have the committee discharged from the consideration of that resolution also; and modified his motion accordingly.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, in order to admit the motion of Mr. KENNEDY. The House refused to suspend—ayes 70, noes 52—not two-thirds.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BOTTS rose and inquired of the Chair whether the proposition which he had given notice of his intention to submit on yesterday, could be now received and entertained as a privileged question.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BOTTS then said that he came prepared to acquit himself of the pledge which he was under, to prefer charges against the acting President of the United States.

Here Mr. EVERETT arose and inquired if he was to understand the Chair as deciding that the proceeding on the part of the gentleman from Virginia was in order at that time.

The SPEAKER replied that he had so decided. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] in bringing forward articles of impeachment, presented to the House a high constitutional question, and one which was privileged.

Mr. EVERETT said, as he desired to take the sense of the House upon this point, he would appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CUSHING asked for the yeas and nays on the appeal.

Mr. WISE. State the question before the House.

Mr. BOTTS inquired whether he was to understand the gentlemen [Messrs. WISE and CUSHING] as objecting to the consideration of the motion he had made?

Several voices: "No."

The bustle prevailing throughout the hall about this time having subsided,

Mr. BOTTS resumed the remarks he had begun. He said that he proposed to introduce charges of corruption, of mal-conduct in office, of high crimes and misdemeanors, committed by the acting President of the United States—charges which he stood prepared to prove, by testimony the most conclusive. He asked that the House might appoint a committee to investigate the charges, and to report what course it was proper to pursue. He was himself prepared to prove every charge which he should bring against the President. He not only asked, but he DEMANDED an opportunity of making these charges good. Were he to come here as the humblest citizen of the Republic, and declare his readiness to prove them, he would claim the privilege of doing so as such; much more so, then, did he claim, and insist upon it, as the Representative of fifty thousand people. It was his highest constitutional privilege. One hundred members of this House had declared, and placed it on record, that John Tyler had committed impeachable offences. He (Mr. B.) had so declared; and he considered it due to his own personal honor and reputation that he should be permitted to prove the truth of what he asserted. He was not one of those who dealt in vague and general charges, but would not come up and put their assertions in a tangible form. He made no charges which he was not prepared to sustain with the most conclusive proof. Since his first agitation of this subject at the last session, he had been deeply reflecting and deliberating upon it; and the more he reflected, the more imperative appeared his duty to make these charges. In doing so, he must declare that, so far from being actuated by a desire to render himself conspicuous before the country, and place himself ahead of those on that floor whose lead he generally followed, and whom he would be proud to follow on this as on other subjects, he must be permitted to declare that this was the most painful duty he had ever undertaken to perform. He declared that he was actuated alone by the obligations which rested upon him. He knew not how long he should be a member of the House of Representatives. If the ability of the Legislature of his State was equal to their good-will towards him, he should not sit here long; [laughter;] but he could not retire to private life, unless he had first discharged this sacred duty. Should he live to see the overgrown power of the Executive hereafter trampling under foot all opposition—the independence of the Legislature sacrificed—the energies of the people relaxed into listlessness at Executive encroachment and obedience to his will;—should he witness such a state of things in this country, he would have the satisfaction, with a proud heart and erect bearing, that he, for one, at least, had endeavored to arrest it.

Here Mr. EVERETT rose to a question of order. He said he had taken an appeal from the decision of the Chair, by which the gentleman [Mr. BOTTS] was allowed to proceed.

Mr. BOTTS asked if the gentleman was not too late with his objection?

The SPEAKER said no. The gentleman had a right to insist on his appeal.

Mr. BOTTS said he was recognised by the Chair, and inquired whether his resolution could not be entertained as a privileged question.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BOTTS was proceeding with his remarks before the gentleman [Mr. EVERETT] made his objection, and he submitted whether the gentleman was not too late in taking an appeal.

Mr. EVERETT insisted upon his position. He was anxious to have the bill to repeal the bankrupt law taken up and disposed of.

Mr. BOTTS said that if the gentleman apprehended that his resolution would consume too much of the time of the House, he was prepared to submit it in such a form as would render it not liable to the least objection. The whole subject might then be disposed of in fifteen minutes.

Mr. EVERETT observed that he did not, at first, know the object the gentleman had in view; and, therefore, listened awhile to his remarks, till he learned what it was. He then immediately rose, and appealed from the decision of the Chair. It was with great reluctance that he interrupted the gentleman, but he felt desirous that the business of the House should not be delayed by any collateral matter. There were two subjects now before the House, on which debate was going on; and he was for bringing both those subjects to a close as soon as possible. The Speaker had decided that this was a privileged question, and from that decision he appealed. If the House decided against the appeal, then the gentleman from Virginia could go on with his remarks.

The SPEAKER had no doubt that, if the gentleman from Vermont insisted on his point of order and the appeal, he must put the question on it.

The SPEAKER then stated the question; and, at the request of Mr. GILMER, repeated his decision, and the point of order and appeal of the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. WISE asked if any motion was made in writing. If so, he should like to have it read, in order that he might judge for himself when he came to vote.

Mr. BOTTS said that he would read it himself.

Mr. WISE wished the Clerk to read it.

Mr. BOTTS replied that he would rather read it himself, as he understood his own writing better than anybody else did.

Mr. B. then began reading, and had read but a few passages, when

Mr. COOPER of Georgia expressed a wish that the gentleman would read from the Clerk's table. We can't (said he) hear a word in this part of the House.

Mr. BOTTS. I will take a position where the gentleman can here me, [going to a seat further back in the circle.] Mr. B. then read the following charge:

"I do impeach John Tyler, Vice President, acting as President of the United States, of the following high crimes and misdemeanors:

"1. I charge him with gross usurpation of power and violation of law, in attempting to exercise a controlling influence over the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, by ordering the payment of amounts of long standing, that had been by them rejected for want of legal authority to pay, and threatening them with expulsion from office unless his orders were obeyed; by virtue of which threat, thousands were drawn from the public treasury without the authority of law.

"2. I charge him with a wicked and corrupt abuse of the power of appointment to, and removal from, office; first, in displacing those who were competent and faithful in the discharge of their public duties, only because they were supposed to entertain a political preference for another; and, secondly, in bestowing them on creatures of his own will, alike regardless of the public welfare and his duty to the country.

"3. I charge him with the high crime and misdemeanor of aiding to excite a disorganizing and revolutionary spirit in the country, by placing on the records of the State Department his objections to a law, as carrying no constitutional obligation with it; whereby the several States of this Union were invited to disregard and disobey a law of Congress, which he himself had sanctioned and sworn to see faithfully executed, from which nothing but disorder, confusion, and anarchy can follow.

"4. I charge him with being guilty of a high misdemeanor, in retaining men in office for months after they have been rejected by the Senate as unworthy, incompetent, and unfaithful, with an utter defiance of the public will, and total indifference to the public interests.

"5. I charge him with the high crime and misdemeanor of withholding his assent to laws indispensable to the just operations of government, which involved no constitutional difficulty on his part; of depriving the Government of all legal sources of revenue; and of assuming to himself the whole power of taxation, and of collecting duties of the people without the authority or sanction of law.

"6. I charge him with an arbitrary, despotic, and corrupt abuse of the veto power, to gratify his personal and political resentments against the Senate of the United States, for a constitutional exercise of their prerogative, in the rejection of his nominees to office, with such evident marks of inconsistency and duplicity as leave no room to doubt his disregard of the interests of the people, and his duty to his country.

"7. I charge him with gross official misconduct, in having been guilty of a shameless duplicity, equivocation, and falsehood, with his late Cabinet and Congress, which led to idle legislation, and useless public expense; and by which he has brought such dishonor on himself as to disqualify him from administering the Government with advantage, honor, or virtue, and for which alone he would deserve to be removed from office.

8. I charge him with an illegal and unconstitutional exercise of power, in instituting a commission to investigate the past transactions under a former administration of the custom-house in New York, under the pretence of seeing the laws faithfully executed—with having arrested the investigation at a moment when the inquiry was to be made as to the manner in which those laws were executed under his own administration—with having directed or sanctioned the appropriation of large sums of the public revenue to the compensation of officers of his own creation, without the authority of law; which, if sanctioned, would place the entire revenues of the country at his disposal.

"9. I charge him with the high misdemeanor of having withheld from the Representatives of the people information called for, and declared to be necessary to the investigation of stupendous frauds and abuses alleged to have been committed by agents of the Government, both upon individuals and the Government itself, whereby he himself becomes accessary to those frauds."

Mr. BOTTS then said that he wished to connect no man or set of men with his fame on this resolution. He wished no man to commit himself on it till he had an opportunity of proving the truth of his charges.

Mr. WISE interrupted his colleague, and asked for the reading of the proposition founded on the charges. He did not wish to hear the gentleman's speech till he was in possession of the whole subject.

Mr. BOTTS submitted that the matter was not within the control of his colleague.

The SPEAKER requested the gentleman to submit his motion to the House; when

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED BY BLAIR AND RIVES, AT ONE DOLLAR PER SESSION, IN ADVANCE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 18, 1843. VOLUME 12....No. 10.

Mr. BOTTS read the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members be appointed, with instructions diligently to inquire into the truth of the preceding charges preferred against John Tyler, and to report to this House the testimony taken to establish said charges, together with their opinion whether the said John Tyler hath so acted in his official capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BOTTS then observed that he had but one remark to make, and he hoped he would not be interrupted by his colleague while making it. After having been challenged, defied, and dared to make these charges—

Mr. WISE would throw no obstructions in his colleague's way. All that he desired was, that the strict order of the House should be preserved in these proceedings.

Mr. BOTTS asked permission of the House to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER observed that, except by universal consent, the gentleman could not be indulged; and the gentleman from Virginia on his right [Mr. WISE] objected.

Mr. WISE said that he would not object to his colleague's proceeding, when the matter was fully before the House. As he understood it, the question was now on the appeal of the gentleman from Vermont; the decision of which would be a decision whether the matter was before the House or not. All that he asked was, that equal latitude of debate should be allowed to all.

Mr. BOTTS said that all he wanted to remark was, that he desired to connect no man, or set of men, with his proposition. He desired no man or party to be committed on it, till the evidence was before the House. By the appointment of a committee to investigate the testimony he would be able to bring forward, they would be able to decide, at a future day, whether Mr. Tyler had committed acts deserving of impeachment by that House. If he succeeded in establishing the truth of these charges, he presumed there would be no member of that House found voting against the impeachment. If, on the contrary, he failed in establishing them, let the odium fall on him, and him alone. He was willing to take all the responsibility; and he wanted no man now to commit himself for or against the charges he offered.

The SPEAKER here asked permission to explain more fully the grounds of his decision. Since the present Speaker had been in the chair, there had been no case of this kind before the House, and only two cases since the beginning of the Government. The first was that of Chief Justice Chase, in which no question like the one now raised was presented. That case was then considered and acted upon by the House as a privileged question. Mr. Randolph rose in his seat, and, without any resolution or specific charges, after some remarks on the conduct of Judge Chase, moved for a committee to take into consideration the propriety of impeaching him. The matter went on day after day, and, by the universal acquiescence of the House, took preference of all other business as a privileged question. In addition to this, the Chair considered this as a high constitutional question, paramount to all others, without reference to the rules of the House. The Chair, therefore, considered the House bound to act on the resolution, either by reception or rejection of it.

Mr. EVERETT then withdrew his appeal. His reason, he said, for making it, was, that he wished to see the business of the House carried on.

Mr. RAYNER here moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE wished to make an inquiry, and requested the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion, promising to renew it. He wished to inquire what the charges were, and from whom they came. He understood that this House only could make charges on which to found an impeachment.

Mr. BOTTS referred as precedents to the case of Judge Chase, in which Mr. Randolph made the charges; and to the case of Judge Peck, in which the charges were made by a member of the Missouri bar. In both cases, the matter was referred to a committee. What he now presented were not articles of impeachment, but charges for a committee to investigate the truth of, and to found an impeachment on, if substantiated.

Mr. WISE, in a few observations, contended that there was no precedent in the case of Judge Chase; and if the House would look into it, they would find that there was no analogy between that and the present case. In this case, his colleague made himself the impeaching power.

Mr. BOTTS, at the suggestion of Mr. McKAY; modified his resolution, by inserting the word "preceding," before the word "charges." Mr. B. took the occasion further to modify his resolution, by adding "and that the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers."

The resolution as modified was then read; when

Mr. WISE said: Now, sir, I ask, what are the preceding charges?

Mr. BOTTS said that he had now appended the resolution to the charges, and would send them up in that form to be read.

Mr. WISE. I only wish to inquire, further, whether these charges are signed by any person? Who is "I?"

Mr. BOTTS. No, sir; they are not signed; but I can put my name to them—and do it in the presence of witnesses, too, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. PROFFIT. Send them up; send them up.

The charges and resolution were then sent up to the Chair, and read by the Clerk.

At the conclusion of the reading by the Clerk, there were loud cries of "Question," "Question."

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the resolution on the table. [Cries of "Oh, no; let us have a vote."]

Mr. BOTTS called for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. WISE, and many other members, entreated Mr. C. JOHNSON to withdraw his motion; but he refused to do so.

The yeas and nays were then ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 101, nays 119, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Sherlock J. Andrews, Arrington, Baker, Barton, Bidlack, Borden, Bowne, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burnell, William Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Williams, Wise, Augustus Young, and John Young—119.

So the motion was negatived.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question; which was agreed to.

Mr. CUSHING demanded the yeas and nays on the question, Shall the main question be now put? [Cries of "Oh, no."]

Mr. PROFFIT. Yes; let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. TURNEY inquired what would be the effect of negativing the main question?

The SPEAKER replied, it would drive the question over till to-morrow.

Mr. CUSHING then withdrew his call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed the demand; and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk began to call the roll, when

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose and said he recollected that, under a recent decision of the Speaker, the effect of deciding against putting the main question would be to lay it over from day to day, as had occurred a short time ago; he would therefore withdraw his demand for the yeas and nays. [Cries of "Oh! no; it is too late."] Well, then, he gave notice that, if the main question should be negatived, he would move a reconsideration of the vote seconding the demand for the previous question.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and resulted—yeas 122, nays 90, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barton, Beeson, Birdseye, Black, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Bowne, Boyd, Bronson, Aaron V. Williams, Winthrop, Wood, Augustus Young, and John Young—90.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had ordered the main question to be put, and also of the vote by which the previous question was seconded. He was about to debate the motion; but was called to order.

The SPEAKER decided that one motion only could be entertained at a time. The motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put, would first be in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD accordingly made that motion, and asked for the yeas and nays thereon.

The House refused to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked for tellers.

The House refused to order tellers.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider, and the House refused to agree to it.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] i. e. of impeachment—

Mr. GRANGER rose and said that one of the proposed charges against the President of the United States was, that he removed certain innocent men from office. [Laughter.] Now, there was a time when he (Mr. G.) acted as accessory to the President, in the execution of a number of political innocents, [laughter,] and he should therefore ask to be excused from voting upon the acceptance of the charges preferred.

Mr. HOPKINS asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

The House agreed to excuse the gentleman—yeas 111, nays 91. When Mr. HOUSTON's name was called, he rose and inquired if it was too late to ask the gentleman [Mr. GRANGER] a question. He wished to know whether the gentleman from New York considered the charge of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] as implicating himself, and rendering him liable to the charge of corruption in office?

The SPEAKER said it was too late to ask and answer a question after the call of the roll had been commenced.

The question then recurred on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] and resulted as follows: ayes 83, nays 127.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Barnard, Birdseye, Black, Boardman, Botts, Boyd, Milton Brown, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, John C. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Wood, and Augustus Young—127.

So the House refused to adopt the resolution.

The SPEAKER then announced that the next business in order would be the reception of reports from the standing committees; and, they being called on, reports were made as follows:

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to legalize the sale of certain lands made at Chocchuma and Columbus, Mississippi; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. HOWARD presented the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, on the subject of a military road from Saganaw to Mackinac.

Mr. WELLER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill declaratory of the 1st and 2d articles of the treaty made with the Chippewa Indians at Saganaw, Michigan; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Mrs. Ann Wangus; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. WOOD reported a joint resolution directing the application of an existing appropriation for building a dry-dock at Brooklyn, New York; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. ADAMS presented the memorial of Horatio Greenough on the subject of the disposal of his statue of Washington; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Gresham; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. MATHIOT, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Powers; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution for the distribution of certain copies of the census returns, and the Compendium of the Sixth Census; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. PENDLETON said he had a petition which he wished to present, from a soldier of Wayne's army, who was wounded at the battle of Maumee; and begged leave to accompany it with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the laws relating to revolutionary pensions, to the armies employed against the Indians northwest of the Ohio river prior to the year 1795, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was adopted, and the petition referred to the same committee.

Mr. CHAPMAN presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, on the subject of the appointment of an agent to settle all questions remaining unsetted under the late Creek treaty: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ROOSEVELT presented a petition from sundry citizens of New York, complaining of the operations of the new tariff on the importation of hardware. As the memorial contained valuable statistical information, he moved that it be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr UNDERWOOD presented the memorial of sundry captains and owners of steamboats navigating the western waters, complaining of the act of Congress regulating steamboat transportation; which was referred to a select committee.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The SPEAKER said that the next business in order would be the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] to refund the fine imposed on General Jackson.

Mr. EVERETT moved to postpone that resolution till to-morrow; which motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER said that the resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of the exchequer, would be the next business in order.

Mr. PROFFIT, who had the floor, addressed the House in reply to Mr. MARSHALL; and, in the course of his remarks, commented very severely on the tortuous course of the Whig party. He could not keep the run of them; and at no one time did he know where to find them. At the last session, a large majority of them declared that the President was guilty of impeachable offences; and now, when one of their number stood boldly forward, and brought forth his charges on which to found an impeachment, staking his reputation, name, and fame on the truth of them,—why, they were gone. This morning, it was decided that the President was unimpeached and unimpeachable. He was willing, and all the business men of the country were willing that they should withdraw their case, pay costs, and let it drop. For his part, he would have been perfectly willing that the impeachment should have gone on, as he would like to see the black silk gowns, and other trappings of a court of impeachment; but he did not vote for the resolution, because he did not believe in the truth of the charges, or that they contained impeachable matter. He conceived, however, that every gentleman who voted for it believed that the charges did contain impeachable matter.

Mr. T. F. MARSHALL here asked leave to make an explanation; which being granted, he said that he voted for the resolution, but did not expect, nor did he wish, to be understood as committing himself to the questions, either as to the propriety of an impeachment, or whether the charges contained impeachable matter, which was one of the gravest and most difficult questions which could be brought forward. Further, he had not examined that question. He was only in favor of giving the gentleman the committee, and nothing more.

Mr. PROFFIT. Well, sir, here is one of the first lawyers in the House, that is not for endorsing the charges as containing impeachable matter. I take it for granted that all the lawyers in the House will say the same thing, and that the vote on the resolution was a kind of accommodation vote.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia asked leave to make an explanation. He was far from thinking, in the vote he gave, of expressing any opinion in regard to this matter. He merely intended to say that it was due to the gentleman from Virginia, due to the country, and due to the officer, that he should vote for a committee of investigation. He did not believe for one moment, that any committee could be found who could implicate the President.

Mr. PROFFIT hoped there would be no more explanations, and that he might be permitted to go on. The gentleman from Virginia, it seemed, was to be left alone in his glory.

Mr. BOTTS asked leave to make an explanation. He was prouder of the position he occupied, than that of any other gentleman on the floor.

Mr. PROFFIT made a remark in reply, which was not heard; and then went on to notice the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] and the charges that gentleman had made against the Executive and his friends on that floor. The gentleman said that he (Mr. P.) and his friends took the pet lamb and crippled it, and he thought, with the gentleman from Kentucky, that the gentleman from New York was perfectly competent to speak about sheep. Mr. P., for himself, confessed that the gentleman's speech was the most sheepish speech he had ever heard.

Again, (said Mr. P.,) we were told that the friends of the President follow his lead on all occasions; and, in five minutes after, in direct contradiction to what he had just said, he charged us with disagreeing with the President, and making his bill our own. One moment, the gentleman charged him (Mr. P.) and his friends with following the President's lead; and the next, he charged them with having taken the President's pet lamb and cropping it, and cutting its tail off. Why did not the Whig party have their caucuses as formerly, and agree upon a plan of attack?

After some further remarks, he denied that he was in favor of the President's exchequer plan in all its details; but, nevertheless, he was surprised, on passing through Cincinnati, on his way to the seat of the General Government, to find so many persons in favor of it—from 5,000 to 6,000 of whom in that city had signed a petition to Congress, praying its passage, with very distinguished Whig gentlemen at their head. The report of the gentleman from New York, which originated this debate, he had no doubt every Democrat would wish to see printed; nay, he doubted not they would vote to print 10,000 extra copies, for it was the strongest report in favor of the sub-treasury that ever emanated from any committee on earth. He knew they said the sub-treasury had some errors; but every word in that report, against the exchequer, was an argument against a bank of the United States. They went against expansive power: and was not that right? and was it not an argument against a bank of the United States as well as against the President's exchequer? He pursued this theme some time; then replied to arguments based on the assumption that the officers of the Government would issue more paper than the law allowed under the exchequer, pointing to the issue of treasury notes, which was not known to exceed the authorized amount, under Mr. Van Buren's or the subsequent Administration. He then cited a case to show the influence of leading politicians in procuring for their friends loans from a national bank. He next noticed some remarks made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] yesterday on the present exchequer plan.

Mr. MARSHALL explained.

Mr. WISE desired to correct the report of Mr. MARSHALL's remarks, which appeared in the National Intelligencer of this morning, as far as they regarded himself. In that report, Mr. MARSHALL was made to say that he (Mr. W.) had said he might be waked up at 4 or 6 o'clock in the morning, and he could tell what Mr. Tyler would do in relation to any measure.

Mr. MARSHALL said he did not make any such remark.

Mr. WISE continued. What he said in the remarks referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] was, that he could tell, on any morning at 6 o'clock, when fairly awake, whether Mr. Tyler would sign a United States Bank bill or not. He did not assume to know what he would do upon other subjects. He could make one additional remark. It was two weeks after the death of General Harrison, when he (Mr. W.) was on his circuit, canvassing for Congress, before he heard of the death of that man. The news of his death was accompanied with the inaugural address of John Tyler, in which it was stated that he would, as regarded a United States bank, follow the example of the fathers of the Republican faith. Between that moment and the interview which he had with Mr. Tyler, after the death of General Harrison, he had some hesitation about the course which Mr. T. would pursue upon the subject. He did not know whether he would follow the example of Madison on the one hand, or of Jefferson on the other. Yet, always having believed, himself, that a bank of the United States was constitutional, and knowing that it had been so decided, he had hoped the President had determined to remain stare decisis, and to sanction the establishment of such an institution. Under that impression, and with this doubt upon his mind, he came to Washington. His first interview with the President dispelled every doubt; and from that time forward, he could not have been waked up without declaring that John Tyler never would sign a bank bill. He knew John Tyler's history well. John Tyler had been his constituent, as also he had been John Tyler's. He knew his votes in the Legislature of Virginia, and in Congress; and, from that knowledge, he was enabled to make up his opinion.

Mr. T. F. MARSHALL was glad that the gentleman [Mr. WISE] had made the correction of the report of his remarks. He (Mr. M.) had himself intended to have made the same correction.

Mr. PROFFIT resumed, and proceeded to address the House upon various political topics of the present day. He defended the President from the charge of wishing to have his exchequer scheme passed without an amendment, and even without the dotting of an i and the crossing of a t. He charged it upon the party opposed to him, that they passed a bank bill without the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t, and without affording opportunity for due consideration. He charged them with making a report which avoided the issues before the country, and with a condemnation of the exchequer project by a committee, on which there was not a friend of the President to vindicate his views. He pressed upon the consideration of the House the fact that the Democratic Review and several leading papers of the Democratic party had advocated a plan of finance precisely similar to that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING;] and replied to the remark that the friends of the President thought one way with regard to this measure, and his friends another.

Mr. CUSHING asked permission to withdraw the motion he had made to commit the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the exchequer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EVERETT objected to the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. PROFFIT resumed. He replied to the remark that Mr. Webster said the plan of an exchequer, as reported by the friends of the President, was not worth a rush, by saying that this showed that the friends of the President had agreed to differ among one another without quarrelling. They were all independent men. As to the remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that he for a long time slept with Webster's works under his pillow, he (Mr. P.) would say that he believed Dickens (more generally called Boz) had made the same remark about his sleeping with some book about him. He (Mr. P.) believed he should hereafter get a pile of books and put them under his head every night. All he had to say about the Whigs not assigning to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] such a position as he deserved, and was entitled to by his commanding talents, was, that the Whig party were ungrateful. The gentleman, however, on that subject, only made the same speech which he (Mr. P.) had heard him make twice before. He asked the Whigs if they really meant to do nothing in relation to the currency, except what they had proposed already. If not, he begged they would say so, and let it go out to the country. The Democrats would come into the next Congress with a great majority; and he predicted that they would pass nothing but the ordinary appropriation bills. They would make no new issues before the people. Though willing to go before the country on the sub-treasury, yet they would talk about its modification, and about having a chest for the accommodation of the people, by selling them small drafts at a discount.

He then went on, until the expiration of his hour, defining what he thought would be the position of the Democratic party, the Whig party, and the Administration.

After he had concluded,

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor, and made a personal explanation in relation to the loan of the United States Bank to Owens, referred to by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT.]

Without concluding, he moved an adjournment; which was carried.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 11, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem laid before the Senate a report from the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in relation to the manner of the expenditure of the appropriations subject to his control; which,

On motion by Mr. EVANS, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

THE QUINTUPLE TREATY.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitted in reply to the resolution of the Senate of the 27th December last, calling upon him for information as to whether the quintuple treaty for the suppression of the slave-trade had been communicated to the Government of the United States in any form whatever, and as to what had been the course of the Government in relation thereto, &c. The communication states that no application had been made to this Government to become a party to that treaty; but that agents abroad, who regarded the signature of that treaty as an occurrence of some political importance, had transmitted unofficial copies of it to the State Department; but that it had not been communicated from any other quarter, or in any other form.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the communication was ordered to be printed; and, on motion by Mr. ARCHER, it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented certain documents from the War Department, relative to a claim pending before the Committee on Public Lands; which was referred to that committee.

Mr. MILLER presented a memorial, signed by P. K. Dickerson and other citizens of North Carolina, residing on the line of the Raleigh Railroad, praying such a modification of the tariff as to allow railroad iron to be imported free of duty: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. M. also presented a memorial from citizens of the city of Washington, praying that the charters of the banks in said city may be extended for ten years: referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BATES presented the memorial of Horatio Greenough, sculptor, upon the subject of the statue of Washington, suggesting the propriety of a change of its position. Mr. B. moved its reference to the Joint Committee on the Library, stating that the memorial was a paper of much merit and interest, as was everything coming from the hands or pen of that distinguished artist. The memorial was referred accordingly, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the memorial of William Russell, praying for fishing bounty, reported a bill for his relief, and others; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report accompanying it ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of Rufus and Charles Lane, praying for fishing bounty, reported a bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Twin; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report accompanying it ordered to be printed.

Mr. H., from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Samuel Brown, praying additional compensation for his services as naval officer at Providence, Rhode Island; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. H., from the same committee, made reports, which were ordered to be printed, adverse to the passage of the following bills from the House, viz:

The bill for the relief of owners, masters, and crew, of the schooner Joanna, of Ellsworth, Maine.

The bill (499) for the relief of Samuel Billings, owner of the fishing-schooner Laura.

The bill (227) for the relief of the owners, master, and crew of the schooner Martha, of Eastport, Maine.

The bill (390) for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Martha.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, with an amendment, the bill for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company, and the Grand Gulf Railroad and Banking Company.

Mr. E. also reported back, from the same committee, the bill from the House for the relief of John Gerard Ford, accompanied by a written report adverse to its passage; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Committee on Commerce, made reports, which were ordered to be printed, adverse to the passage of the following House bills, viz:

The bill (414) for the relief of Isaac Champlin, and others, owners of the schooner Buffalo; and,

The bill (415) for the relief of Orrin Prentiss, of Stonington, Connecticut, owner of the schooner Lilly, and the crew of said vessel.

Mr. ARCHER presented a petition from persons residing at Harper's Ferry, and in the neighborhood, praying a restoration of the civil superintendency over the armory at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Abraham R. Van Nest and others, of the city of New York, praying for the unconditional repeal of the (so called) bankrupt act, upon the ground of its unconstitutionality, and because it was destructive of the rights of creditors.

In presenting this petition, Mr. B. took leave, under the indulgence of the Senate, to correct, for the third time in this body, an error into which he had fallen some time back in relation to voluntary bankruptcy. He had been led to believe that bankruptcy might be voluntary—that the English bankrupt system contained this principle; and, consequently, the principle came to us as a part of the system which we had borrowed from England. He had been led to believe this, and had expressed himself in several speeches to that effect. He had spoken in favor of this voluntary bankruptcy, and, on questions of amendment, or in substitution of one bill for another, he had voted in favor of it. But it was all wrong, and he had declared and renounced the error in two speeches heretofore made before the Senate—once in December, 1841, and again in August 1842—on both which occasions he had traced the error to its source, and showed there was no such thing in the English systems. The sixth section of the act of George IV (1826) was the foundation of this error: on referring to that section, (which he did a year or two ago,) he found that the section only authorized those traders and merchants who were the proper subject of a bankrupt law to make a declaration of insolvency, and file it in the bankrupt court, where it operated as an act of bankruptcy, on which the creditors might proceed, or not, as they pleased. If the creditors did not proceed, and that within a limited time, the declaration of insolvency stood for nothing: the debtor could not proceed upon it—he could not drag the creditors into court! Thus the section shows. Mr. B. here read the section as follows:

"SEC. 6. That if any such trader shall file in the office of the Lord Chancellor's secretary of bankrupts, a declaration in writing, signed by such trader, and attested by an attorney or solicitor, that he is insolvent or unable to meet his engagements, the said secretary of bankrupts, or his deputy, shall sign a memorandum that such declaration hath been filed; which memorandum shall be authority for the London Gazette to insert an advertisement of such declaration therein; and every such declaration shall, after such advertisement inserted as aforesaid, be an act of bankruptcy committed by such TRADER at the time when such declaration was filed: but no commission shall issue thereupon, unless it be sued out within two calendar months next after the insertion of such advertisement, and unless such advertisement shall have been inserted in the London Gazette within eight days after such declaration filed. And no docket shall be struck upon such act of bankruptcy before the expiration of four days next after such insertion of such advertisement, in case such commission is to be executed in London; or before the expiration of eight days next after such insertion, in case such commission is to be executed in the country: and the Gazette containing such advertisement shall be evidence to be received of such declaration having been filed."

Having read this section, Mr. B. said it was explicit, and precluded argument. The voluntary action of the debtor, which it authorized, was limited to the mere filing of the declaration of insolvency. It went no further; and it was confined to traders—to the trading classes—who, alone, were subject to the laws of bankruptcy. Mr. B. said his first error, in acting upon this idea of voluntary bankruptcy, applicable both to traders and those who were not, was committed in 1827, soon after the British act passed, and when he had not seen it. It was, in fact, only one or two years ago that he had seen the statute; and, from that time, had renounced the error.

Mr. B. said that the English had, as we all know, an INSOLVENT SYSTEM, as well as a BANKRUPT SYSTEM. They had an INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT, as well as a BANKRUPT COURT; and both these were kept separate, although there were no STATES in England to be trodden under foot by treading down the insolvent laws. No so with us. Our insolvent laws, though belonging to States called sovereign, are all trampled under foot! There would be a time to go into this. At present, Mr. B. would only say that, in England, bankruptcy and insolvency were still kept distinct; and no insolvent trader was allowed to proceed as a bankrupt. On the contrary, an insolvent, applying in the Insolvent Debtors' Court for the release of his person, could not proceed one step beyond filing his declaration. At that point the creditors took up the declaration, if they pleased, transferred the case to the Bankrupt Court, and prosecuted the case in that court. This is done by virtue of the 13th section of the Insolvent Debtors Act of 7th Geo. IV., (1827.) Mr. B. read the section, as follows:

Insolvent debtors act of 7th year of George IV, (1827.)

SEC. 13. "And be it further enacted, That the filing of the petition of every person in actual custody, who shall be subject to the laws concerning bankrupts, and who shall apply by petition to the said court for his or her discharge from custody, according to this act, shall be accounted and adjudged an act of bankruptcy from the time of filing such petition; and that any commission issuing against such person, and under which he or she shall be declared bankrupt before the time appointed by the said court, and advertised in the London Gazette, for hearing the matters of such petition, or at any time within two calendar months from the time of filing such petition, shall have effect to avoid any conveyance and assignment of the estate and effects of such person, which shall have been made in pursuance of the provisions of this act: Provided, always, That the filing of such petition shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy, unless such person be so declared bankrupt before the time so advertised as aforesaid, or within such two calendar months as aforesaid; but that every such conveyance and assignment shall be good and valid, notwithstanding any commission of bankruptcy under which such person shall be declared bankrupt after the time so advertised as aforesaid, and after the expiration of such two calendar months as aforesaid."

This (said Mr. B.) accords with the section of the year before in the bankrupt act. The two sections are accordant, and identical in their provisions. They keep up the great distinction between insolvency and bankruptcy, which some of our judges have undertaken to abrogate: they keep up, also, the great distinction between the proper subjects of bankruptcy—to wit: traders, and those who are not traders; and they keep up the distinction between the release of the person (which is the object of insolvent laws) and the extinction of the debt with the consent of creditors, which is the object of insolvent systems. By this section, if the "person" in custody who files declaration of insolvency shall be a trader, subject to the laws of bankruptcy, it only operates as an act of bankruptcy, upon which the creditors may proceed, or not, as they please. If they proceed, it is done by suing out a commission of bankruptcy; which carries the case to the bankrupt court. If the creditors do not proceed, the petition of the insolvent trader only releases his person. Being subject to bankruptcy, his creditors may call him into the bankrupt court, if they please; if they do not, he cannot take it there, nor claim the benefit of bankruptcy in the insolvent court: he can only get his person released. This is clear from the section; and our act of 1840 committed something worse than a folly in not copying this section. That act creates two sorts of bankruptcy—voluntary and involuntary—and, by a singular folly, makes them convertible! so that all may be volunteers, if they please. It makes merchants, traders, bankers, and some others of the trading classes, subject to involuntary bankruptcy: then it gives all persons whatever the right to proceed voluntarily. Thus the involuntary subjects of bankruptcy may become volunteers; and the distinction becomes ridiculous and null. Our act, which is compiled from the English Insolvent Debtors Act, and is itself nothing but an insolvent law perverted to the abolition of debts at the will of the debtor, should have copied the 13th section of the English insolvent law: for want of copying this, it annihilated involuntary bankruptcy—made all persons, traders or not, volunteers who chose to be so—released all debts, at the will of the debtor, without the consent of a single creditor—and committed the most daring outrage upon the laws of property which the world ever beheld!

The petition was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of Casper W. Weaver.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report (which was ordered to be printed) adverse to the passage of the bill from the House, for the relief of Gorham A. Worth, one of the sureties of Samuel Edmunds, deceased:

Mr. D , from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of Alexander M. Jenkins, and others, sureties of William Linn, late receiver at Vandalia, Illinois, praying to be discharged from their joint liabilities on the payment of the distributive proportions of the judgments obtained against them, respectively, made an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Anne F. Green, and other heirs-at-law of Com. Samuel Nicholson, deceased, there being no evidence on which to sustain the claim.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Mary Tucker; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. YOUNG, leave was granted to withdraw from the files the papers of Ephraim Sprague, touching his claim for losses in the Black Hawk war.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition from John Grant, of New Orleans, praying permission to sue the United States for damages incurred by the breach of a contract with the Engineer Department, for removing a bar in the Choctaw pass, in the harbor of Mobile: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SEVIER presented additional documents relating to the claim of Lieut. R. D. Collins, for compensation for services in Florida as quartermaster; which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WOODBURY presented a memorial from John McClintock and others, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, praying indemnity for spoliations committed by the French prior to 1800; which was laid on the table, with the bill on that subject.

The bill to extend the Patent Office to 9th street, was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The joint resolution for the distribution of certain copies of the Census returns and Compendium of the Sixth Census, was read the second time.

The bill for the relief of Henry Gardner and others, directors of an association called the New England Mississippi Land Company, was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an amendment from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BERRIEN explained that the amendment was intended to guard the interest of the United States.

After a few remarks by Messrs. BENTON and TAPPAN adverse to the bill, and by Mr. BERRIEN in its defence, it was, on the motion of Mr. KING, postponed till Monday next, and made the special order for that day.

REPORT ON THE FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

The resolution introduced by Mr. LINN on yesterday, to print 10,000 extra copies of the report of the majority, and 20,000 of the report of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary on the bill to indemnify General Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in the discharge of his official duties, came up for consideration.

Mr. CRITTENDEN did not see what interest Senators could feel in sending the reports abroad in this way, as every newspaper in the country would publish them; and they would be widely disseminated long before the extra copies could be printed and ready for distribution. If it was intended to pay a compliment to some one—either the author of the minority report, or General Jackson himself—he would not be unwilling to entertain the proposition to print a reasonable number of extra copies; but he thought it really an unnecessary and useless expense to order the quantity required by this motion.

Mr. LINN remarked that the printing of the report would not be, by any means, an expensive job. The report was very brief. The objection to printing it, therefore, could not be on the ground of expense. He had no doubt it would be a source of gratification to the people of the country to see the grounds on which the Judiciary Committee reported the bill back to the Senate. Many of the Senators here had received their instructions on the subject of this bill, and they would no doubt be pleased to furnish their constituents with the position in which the matter stands. This would be a good way to do it—for their constituents would see both sides in these reports. On the score of expense, it was a small matter to contend about.

Mr. ARCHER rose merely to remark that it appeared to him the only object they could have in ordering the printing of an extra number of copies of any document was, that it might have a greater circulation than it would naturally obtain through the newspapers, either on account of its great length or some other cause, which possibly might exclude it from the columns of the public newspapers. But, as to these reports, both of them together would scarcely fill a single column: they scarcely exceeded the size of an ordinary letter. If they did order the printing, then, it would not be with the view of obtaining for it a larger circulation, but in order to pay a compliment to some one or other—either to the author of the report, or to General Jackson. But he would submit to the Senate whether it was proper to order the printing for such a purpose, no matter how well-merited the compliment might be. With these views, he felt constrained to vote against the proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut said he would not consider the mere object of paying a compliment, a legitimate reason for incurring the expense of extra copies out of the public money. But this was a different case, as the expense was to be incurred for the information of the people. It is necessary to spread before the people, in an authentic form, the reports of the majority and minority of the committee to which the Senate referred the bill. The arguments thus presented will enable the American people to judge whether this fine is to be refunded, and in what manner. They will be enabled to give expression to their opinions, and to make it known to their representatives, whether they approve of General Jackson's conduct at New Orleans or not. His (Mr. S.'s) object was to obtain the opinion of the American people on the fullest information that could be furnished to them, and therefore, whether the expense was great or small, it would make no difference in the vote he should give to accomplish that object. Having given the people this information, and ascertained their will, he should obey their injunction.

Mr. LINN observed that his friend from Virginia seemed to imply that it was in compliment to the author of the minority report that he had made this motion. He could assure the Senator, if such was his impression, that he had had no such idea as that of merely paying compliments in that way. Throughout the whole affair, in relation to the subject, he had had other motives for what he had done; and he was still actuated by the same motives. Before the subject was brought up, last session of Congress, and during its subsequent discussion, the ground was taken, by the political opponents of Gen. Jackson, that he never had paid this fine himself; and, consequently, his friends were subjected to the imputation of asking for him the repayment of money to which he could have no claim. His object was to bring this question to the test; and he considered that he had now done so; for, although there is nothing in the report of the majority of the committee directly affirmatory of the fact, there is a tacit admission, which it is important should go to the public in an authentic form. The calumny was going through the country like wildfire, that General Jackson did not pay the fine. The discussion on this bill, both last session and the present session, had set that question at rest. It was in every respect desirable that these reports should be disseminated. The committee should stand responsible for its recommendation of an amendment to place the repayment of the fine, on the ground of General Jackson's military services, and not as an act of justice.

Mr. ALLEN demanded the yeas and nays on the resolution; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Chesse, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, McDuffie, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, White, and Woodbridge—23.

So the Senate refused to print the reports for circulation among the people.

The joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle, on certain terms, the liabilities of the sureties of Gordon D. Boyd, late receiver of public moneys at Columbus, Mississippi, was taken up for consideration, and read.

Mr. HENDERSON explained the purpose and object of the resolution. From Mr. H.'s statement, it appeared that, at the time of the speculations in Mississippi lands, G. D. Boyd, the receiver of public moneys at the land office of Columbus, was in the habit of giving certificates of entries to persons who did not pay him in money, but gave checks on distant banks. Several of these checks were dishonored; and, in consequence, Boyd became a defaulter. The lands, in some cases, were conveyed to him, or his securities; and the object of this joint resolution was to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, if he found it to be best for the public interest, to take the lands in discharge of the debt, at the original price from the land office of $1 25 per acre.

Mr. KING objected to any such compromise. If the sureties were able to pay, they should be required to make good the whole of the defalcation. No countenance should be given to such a line of conduct as that practised in this instance. At the time of these speculations it was known that vast tracts were bought and culled over; and now it was proposed to allow the refuse of these tracts—not worth, perhaps, 25 cents an acre—to be handed back to the Government at $1 25. Mr. K., at some length, pointed out the injurious tendencies of such a course.

Mr. EVANS explained that the joint resolution merely gave the Treasury Department power to make the arrangement, if nothing better could be done.

Mr. HENDERSON made an explanation in relation to decisions of the circuit court of the United States in Mississippi, which rendered it doubtful whether the United States could make a better arrangement.

Mr. WALKER said it seemed to him that the matter was not properly understood. On the facts of the case, as presented to the circuit court in Mississippi, no lawyer could entertain a doubt of the propriety of the decision. The case was this: When Mr. Boyd was appointed receiver, in making out the bonds for his securities, an error was committed, which was the occasion of their not being signed. New bonds were preparing, to be signed by new securities; and, in this interval, he issued the certificates of entries, for which he was not paid the money. The court decided that the sureties who did not till subsequently become his securities, were not liable by their bonds to that extent. Now, with regard to so much of the defalcation as originated in this interval, if taking back the lands was the best that could be done, he was willing to support the resolution; but no further.

After a few remarks from Mr. EVANS, the question was taken on the passage of the joint resolution, and decided in the negative: so the resolution was rejected.

The following engrossed bills were taken up, read a third time, and passed:

Senate bill to re-enact and continue in operation the several acts now in force for the relief of insolvent debtors of the United States.

Senate bill for the relief of Wareham Kingsley.

Senate bill for the relief of Elizabeth Monroe.

Senate bill for the relief of William De Buys, postmaster of New Orleans.

Senate bill to provide for ascertaining and disposing of the lead mineral lands in the States of Arkansas and Illinois, and Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, and for other purposes.

House bill for the relief of Joshua Drew.

And the House bill for the relief of Snow Y. Sears.

OREGON TERRITORY.

The bill to authorize the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon came up as the unfinished business; the question pending being, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. TAPPAN said he hoped the bill would be adopted by the Senate; for he considered it of the utmost importance that it should pass, notwithstanding the reasons which had been assigned by the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Massachusetts, on a former day, against its passage. It appeared that, by certain treaty stipulations between this Government and Great Britain, entered into in the year 1818, the British had the right of trading throughout the whole of that territory; of entering into all the ports and harbors upon the coast; and of carrying on their trade therein, as freely and as fully as might be done by the citizens of the United States. Under this treaty, the British Trading Company had erected a fort, called Fort Vancouver, and had settled and cultivated some of the adjacent lands; but to what extent, he (Mr. TAPPAN) did not know.

And now (said Mr. TAPPAN) we have the proposition advanced in this Senate, that these treaty stipulations give to Great Britain a tenancy in common with the Government of the United States within the Oregon Territory—that the subjects of Great Britain had a right to occupy it with the citizens of the United States. No Senator had intimated any doubt as to the title of the United States to the territory, founded upon discovery and upon treaties. As to the treaty or convention of 1818, although he thought the construction put on it by honorable Senators was quite a forced construction, he would guard against the consequences of such construction, that it might not grow up into an admitted claim to the whole territory.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had merely stated what interpretation was put upon the treaty; he had given no opinion as to the correctness of that interpretation.

Mr. TAPPAN said the Senate would recollect that there had been recently before them a question as to the Northeastern boundary of the United States. That question had arisen from the same kind of carelessness or ignorance in our negotiators of the treaty of Ghent, which seems to have prevailed in negotiating the convention of 1818.

By the treaty of peace of 1783, the northwest corner of Nova Scotia was the point from which the boundary line of the United States was to be run, and it was the point at which that boundary line was to terminate. Whatever uncertainty there might be in the description of any part of that boundary, there was none whatever in the place where the line should begin and end; nor was there any difficulty, doubt, or uncertainty as to where that northwest corner was to be found. The map which it is known the commissioners had before them and used, as well as all the English maps of their North American possessions, agreed in placing this corner far north of the St. John river, and west of the bay of Chaleurs. I speak of English maps, because it is well known that the French claimed that the northern part of Maine belonged to Canada, and laid it down accordingly on their maps of that country, even after the peace of 1783. Any ordinary country surveyor might have ascertained where that northwest corner of Nova Scotia was, and from that might have run the north line of Maine; nor would any two honest surveyors have differed as to the position of the corner, or the line to be run from or to it.

This matter, so clear, and, until then, undisputed, was made doubtful and uncertain by our negotiators of the treaty of Ghent. If that treaty, instead of stipulating for the appointment of a joint commission "to run and mark the boundary line between the two Governments," had required such commission "to ascertain the northwest corner of Nova Scotia, and to run the line from and to that point," no difficulty would ever have arisen between the two Governments as to either the north or east line of Maine; but, as the treaty stipulated that if the commissioners disagreed where the line was, it should be left to some friendly power to determine, the British Government, with their usual adroitness, seized upon this agreement to draw off the attention of the people of Great Britain and the United States from the true point for settlement, and fix it upon an inquiry and examination as to where are the highlands mentioned in the treaty of peace. The British Government, after raising this controversy, took possession of the country north of the St. John, and held it by military force. You all know (said Mr. T.) the long train of negotiation which we have been amused with upon this matter; the reference of the question of "where were the highlands" to the King of Holland; his award, and the rejection of it by this Government. He would now ask the attention of the Senate to the close of this controversy to the treaty recently concluded with Lord Ashburton. The negotiation of this treaty shows the complete success of British diplomacy. A territory which had been ours, not only without dispute, but without any suspicion as to the goodness of our title, for more than thirty years, until the treaty of Ghent, was admitted by our own Secretary of State to have never belonged to us. When the late treaty with Great Britain was laid before the Senate, with the correspondence which led to it, it was seen that the boundary settled by it, between our possessions and the British, was one proposed by our Government, and acceded to by the British negotiator, giving them all the territory north of the St. John, and a large tract west, which they had never claimed. We lost all this (said Mr. T.) by negotiation, and would not regain it without a war; for in any future negotiation or reference as to the north line of Maine, we could not expect the British to recede from the St. John, when we had offered, not to cede the country north of that river for an equivalent, but to fix upon that as the true boundary intended to be described in the treaty of 1783. For this reason, he voted to ratify this treaty. The boundary was our own proposition; and we would be considered by the whole civilized world as precluded from advancing a claim to a more northern boundary.

The territory was lost by our own folly, and could not be regained without a war; and war, in the present state of the country, (which he would not explain, as it was understood by every Senator,) was, with him, entirely impracticable.

Individuals (said Mr. T.) are called fools if they will not profit by their own experience: so are nations. If, soon after the treaty of 1783, we had granted the land in the north part of Maine, and invited a settlement to be made on it, it would never have been claimed by Great Britain. The northwest corner of Nova Scotia would now be the northeast corner of the United States. But, instead of settling it ourselves, we let the British settle it; we negotiated until it was gone from us. He was for taking a very different course with the Oregon Territory. He would let the hardy Western yeomanry in upon that country; he would plant fifty thousand rifles there, in hands that knew how to use them; and no more would be heard of British claimants, or British claims to that territory. If (said Mr. T.) this is not done—if, from fear of offending our old mother, we forbear to take strong possession of the country, and go on negotiating and arbitrating about it as we did about Maine—by-and-by some Secretary of State will be found proposing the line of the Rocky Mountains as the Western boundary of our glorious Union. Yes, and proposing it when we dare not involve the nation in a war. He would trust to no such contingency. He would settle the country immediately, and hold it.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, who intimated a desire to examine certain documents relating to this subject, the bill was informally passed over.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 11, 1842.

Mr. LEVY offered a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to communicate to the House a copy of the report, survey, and estimate, with reference to the improvement of the mouth of the river Suwanee; and also, that he prepare and furnish the House with estimates of the sum required to construct a railroad to connect the St. John and Suwanee rivers.

Mr. EVERETT objected to everything out of the regular order of business.

Mr. KING said he had a resolution, which was simply one of inquiry, and would not occupy a minute; but the objection was not withdrawn.

Mr. READ presented a petition for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

The SPEAKER then called for reports of committees, and the following were presented:

Mr. OSBORNE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of George A. Winslow; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, it was ordered that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the consideration of the petitions of citizens of the State of Connecticut, for the improvement of the Thames river; and they were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The same committee, on like motions, was discharged from other petitions and memorials on various subjects.

Mr. HOLMES presented a petition of John H. Sargent, of the State of South Carolina, praying an amendment of the law regulating the granting of patents for inventions.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House the amount of goods lost by fire in the public stores in the city of New York, during the last ten years, and the duties that would have been paid on such goods if they had not been destroyed.

On the motion of Mr. FILLMORE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the general estimates of appropriations for 1843-'44 as relates to the rebuilding of the light-house on Brandywine shoal, Delaware Bay, and to the construction of a light-house on Flynn's Knoll, near Sandy Hook; and that the subjects be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On the motion of Mr. FILLMORE, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the following resolution, viz: "Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency and necessity of so amending the act of the 29th of August last, entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of certain accounts for the support of Government in the Territory of Wisconsin,' as to authorize the Legislatures of the respective Territories of the United States to employ a sufficient number of officers and attendants for the transaction of the public business, and to regulate their per diem compensation, so that it shall not, in the aggregate, exceed the sum of $3 per day to each; and that they report by bill, or otherwise;" and that it be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. POPE, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to authorize the election or appointment of officers in the Territory of Wisconsin; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POPE submitted a resolution to set apart Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, the last day of January and the first two days of February, for the consideration of the business relating to the Territories of the United States.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON hoped that the House would not agree to the resolution. He had no objection to take up the Territorial business at the proper time; but he could not consent to fix specific days, on which it should override all other business, how important soever it might be.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland said, at previous sessions five days had been usually appropriated to Territorial business; but now, only three days were asked.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON reminded the House that there were but 45 legislative days remaining of this short session.

Mr. POPE explained.

Mr. BLACK hoped the resolution would be agreed to. There was a great deal of important business in which the Territories were concerned, which must be laid before the House during the present session. There was the boundary difficulty between the State of Missouri and the Territory of Iowa, which was eliciting much warmth of feeling, and which he hoped the House would take some steps to settle. He entreated the gentleman from Tennessee, therefore, not to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, for three days would be barely sufficient for the disposal of the business to come before them.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON would consent to two days being set apart for the Territorial business; and he suggested the first Friday and Saturday in February. (Cries of "And meet at 10 o'clock.")

Mr. WELLER moved the previous question, observing that the time proposed in the resolution was short enough.

The previous question was sustained by the House, the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee was negatived, and the original resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to amend "An act to provide for the settlement of certain accounts for the support of Government in the Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes;" which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. EVERETT asked if it was in order to move a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of taking up the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

The SPEAKER replied that the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] in relation to the bill to refund the fine of General Jackson, would take precedence during the morning hour.

That subject was then taken up, on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WM. O. BUTLER] had the floor.

Mr. WM. O. BUTLER addressed the House during the hour, in vindication of Gen. Jackson's course, and in advocacy of a return of the fine.

Mr. HUNT obtained the floor; but the morning hour having expired, the subject went over.

THE EXCHEQUER.

The SPEAKER announced the resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means, expressive of the opinion that it was not expedient to adopt the exchequer plan of the Executive, to be the next business in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, who had the floor from yesterday, then resumed the discussion. He commenced by remarking that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT,] in the course of his remarks last night, took occasion to introduce the name of Mr. Clay—as he (Mr. U.) thought, without any great propriety—in an attempt to illustrate, as the gentleman had said, the influence of conspicuous individuals in the administration of the affairs of a bank of the United States. He had subsequently addressed the following letter to the editors of a morning paper:

WASHINGTON, January 10th, 1842.

MESSRS. GALES AND SEATON: In an argument made by me, to-day, in the House of Representatives, I asserted that the Bank of the United States had, in many instances, been influenced, in the granting of accommodations, by persons high in power, and by politicians of conspicuous standing. This assertion was made in reply to the allegation that the exchequer plan of the President was liable to fail under the influence of men in high stations; and I said that gentlemen arguing in favor of a bank of the United States were seemingly forgetful of the fact of its having been so influenced. I then referred to a case from Peters's Reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, 9th volume, page 382—Bank of the United States vs. Waggener and others. I stated that, after the Branch Bank of the United States at Lexington, Kentucky, had twice refused to grant a loan, upon a third application, through the influence or representation of Mr. Clay and other gentlemen, the loan was granted or authorized by the parent board at Philadelphia, notwithstanding the refusal of the branch at Lexington. I also distinctly stated, and repeated, that I did not intend to cast the least shadow of imputation upon either the personal or political character of Mr. Clay; and neither did I intend to say that he was personally concerned in any manner with this bank transaction. A gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. UNDERWOOD, who is now entitled to the floor) said that the case referred to by me would not bear out my assertion. I would deeply lament if I should do any person injustice, particularly Mr. Clay; and therefore I hasten to give the following extracts from the decision referred to.

The following is an extract of the facts in the statement of the case—Peters's Reports, vol. ix., page 382:

"In the state of things existing in 1822, William Owens applied to the office at Lexington for a loan of $5,000, in the notes of the Bank of Kentucky, assuring the bank that they would answer his purpose as well as gold and silver. The offer was rejected by the directors of the bank; and, on its renewal, was again refused. A third time the loan was applied for; the interference of a gentleman connected with the business of the bank (not a director) to procure it was solicited and obtained, and the application was referred to the board at Philadelphia, by which the loan was authorized."

It further appears from this report, page 385—

"That this negotiation was at the earnest instance of Owens, and for his accommodation. When he thought his own instances insufficient, he sought the aid of others, and especially applied to Mr. Clay, who was counsel for the bank, and to the late Colonel Morrison, who had been president of the office, to use their influence as his friends to aid him in obtaining what he asked."

It further appears, from a statement of Mr. Sergeant, counsel for the bank, on page 388: "That the office twice declined his (Owens's) application, and then he employed the influence of his friends, Mr. Clay and Colonel Morrison, to obtain an order from the parent board."

I could give other extracts, if time permitted. My assertion that Mr. Clay's influence was sought and used with the parent bank, was based on the authority of the facts thus disclosed, which distinctly show that "a gentleman not a director," but one "connected with the business of the bank," must have meant Mr. Clay; because Colonel Morrison is stated only to have been president of the bank. Mr. Clay, as appears by the record, was then attorney for the bank at Lexington.

I submit whether my assertion is not sustained by the facts, and I ask an immediate insertion of this letter in the Intelligencer, that Mr. UNDERWOOD or any other gentleman may have an opportunity to correct me if I have unintentionally misrepresented the case. GEORGE H. PROFFIT.

Mr. U. then went on to say, that the first extract in that letter was not complete. It should have gone on and said: "A mortgage on real estate being given as additional security on the loan;" and then it would have shown that, while Mr. Clay was willing to use his influence to obtain a loan for his friends, he took care that it was secured by a mortgage on real estate. This was showing an additional trait in the character of Mr. Clay, with which he (Mr. U.) was satisfied; but he would advise the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] when, in future, he wished to extract a passage from a record, never to stop in the middle of a sentence, nor make a full stop where there should be but a comma. With some other observations on the transaction referred to in the above extracts, he dismissed that subject, and proceeded to other considerations connected with it.

The gentleman from Indiana, by citing the name of Mr. Clay, had desired to prove that a Bank of the United States would yield obedience to the solicitation of distinguished men, and would exercise the expansive power, or grant loans and deal in exchange under the influence of politicians; but in all this, the gentleman had failed to draw an obvious distinction, which could not fail to strike the mind of every man who thought on the subject,

In a bank of the United States, he admitted such influence would exist, in a greater or less degree; but he contended that the danger to be apprehended from the exercise of this power by a directory of private individuals was infinitely less than that which was threatened by its exercise by a Government, to whom the exchequer scheme would give an accumulation of power. There was, therefore, no analogy; nor was there anything in the argument of the gentleman which could operate against the establishment of a national bank; while the full force of his argument operated against giving such power to an Executive or a Government.

He then proceeded to say that, as they should do nothing more than discuss these questions during the present session, they might as well discuss them on this resolution as in any other way. And the first remark which he wished to make on the currency question, and to which he wished to call the attention of the House and of the country, was, that, by the passage of any one of these exchequer bills, they would take the subject from private individuals, or a corporation of private stockholders, and give it to the Government of the country; thereby enlarging its powers to a dangerous extent. The great defect in, and the great error (as he conceived) of, the legislation of the country on the subject of the currency in times past, had been, that it destroyed the association of private individuals forming a Bank of the United States, and giving a currency to the country through their means. The idea was thrown out by Mr. Van Buren, and others of that party, that the association of wealth, in the shape of a corporation, was dangerous to the liberties of the country, and was anti-republican in its tendencies; but, seeing that a currency was necessary, in some way, to meet the wants of the country, this exchequer plan of the Executive was formed, with a view to gain popularity, and to form a middle party. And he (Mr. UNDERWOOD) acknowledged that the exchequer plan would give the country a currency, but it would increase the power and patronage of the Executive to a dangerous extent. He conceived they never could have a currency in this country, which would restore the prosperity of the people, unless it was based on an association of capitalists in the form of a chartered national bank; and instead of making such a corporation pay the Government a bonus, and then allow them to make as much interest as they could on their loans and on bills of exchange, the true policy would be to refuse a bonus, and limit the bank in the amount of its profits; and thus all temptation to expansion would be taken away, and thereby they would diminish the injury to the country, while they would extend the benefits to every rank. The great injury to the country at the present time was the restriction of its currency, and its diminution to a gold and silver standard. He illustrated this part of the subject, by stating its effect on sales under an expanded, in contrast with the prices under a contracted currency; and the difference produced in the ability of the people to secure around them the comforts of life.

Now this exchequer plan of his friend from Massachusetts, instead of increasing the circulating medium of the country—instead of enhancing the price of labor—instead of operating as a remedy for existing evils, simply proposed that there should be dollar for dollar thrown into circulation for the amount of specie in their vaults. So far, therefore, as it operated on the prices of the labor and property of the country, it would have no sort of influence in remedying the evils with which the country was afflicted. What, then, would it do? Its only effect would be to enable the individual that might have $1,000 in his possession, to deposite it in specie, and get that amount in portable currency, that he might carry about him. Now, was it worth while to create an institution which would only have that effect so far as the currency and business of the country was concerned? As a mere fiscal agent, its operation would not be more beneficial than the sub-treasury; and, as that had been condemned both by the popular voice and by the existing Administration; and as it was not, under present circumstances, likely to be resorted to by either party, it was not necessary for him to pursue that point of his argument. As to the exchequer, so far as the currency was concerned, it would have no sort of effect whatever, because it would create no sort of additional circulation. It would only give as much paper circulation as its operations would abstract from the specie circulation of the country; and, therefore, it would not remedy the existing evils produced by a limited amount of currency.

In the progress of the debate, a great many arguments had been urged, which he would like to have time to reply to; but, as it was impossible to go into a discussion of the objects, views, and principles of parties and of men, he should very briefly notice a few things that had been said, and bring his remarks to a close.

It had been said on that floor that the Whig party was prostrate, and that it was incapable of making any effort hereafter to resuscitate itself from the overthrow it had sustained from the Democratic party in the fall elections. He believed that these declarations, made from various quarters, proceeded more from the fears of the individuals making them, than from the solid convictions of their judgments. The only real foundation on which these declarations rested, was the example set by the New York elections of last fall. He would not take the time to go into all the circumstances connected with these elections; but every gentleman who looked at them, and compared them with the elections of 1840, would find that there were more than 40,000 individuals who did not go to the polls.

[A member here said: "Pipe-laying had ceased;" and another was heard to say: "The times were so hard, that they had no money to expend in elections."]

Yes, sir: there were more than 40,000 persons who did not vote at all. The successful candidate fell short of the vote of 1840 more than 4,000 votes; and the defeated candidate more than 20 000. Now, had these voters changed their opinions? and was there any evidence that they would not vote in 1844 as they did in 1840? There was no evidence of it; and those gentlemen who boast of the result felt very much as Bob Bailey the duellist did, when his adversary fell at the first fire. This worthy said that, when he saw his antagonist fall before him, his first sensation was fear lest he might get up again, and demand another fire. So it was with the Democrats exulting over their late victory in New York; they were afraid of meeting their adversaries a second time. He admitted that some things had happened which had a tendency so to sour and chagrin great numbers of the Whig party, that they refrained from going to the polls; but he confidently believed that the great motives which kept them away in 1842, would carry them to the polls in 1844. Everything was tending to form parties on principles, and not on men; and issues made up on principles alone would induce people to go to the polls and vote. Those who had kept away from the polls had seen that their votes would do no good; and therefore they had, in perfect disgust at those who had prevented the adoption of the measures they believed indispensable to the welfare of the country, refrained from voting at the late elections.

How was it in Ohio? The Democratic triumph there was a minority triumph, and they had a minority Governor. There was also the same falling off in the number of votes polled, as was exhibited in the New York elections. Sir, the conduct of the guard and of Mr. Tyler had kept the people away from the polls. [A member asked: Will not the same conduct continue?] No, sir, you can't keep them away in 1844. The constitutional fact will compel them to go. The time has not yet arrived when it is necessary fo them to exert themselves; but the demonstration they made in 1842 in behalf of principles of 1840, will convince their adversaries that the Whig party are strong and united. [A voice: "What are the principles of 1840?"]

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] said the other day, that, if waked up at six o'clock any morning, he could have to'd what John Tyler would do in regard to a bank of the United States—that a bank bill would not be signed by him. That was information which the people of this country had not in their possession. It was not believed in his section of the country. The very fact that Mr. Tyler attended the Harrisburg convention—the very fact, which was known, that Mr. Clay was his favorite candidate for the Presidency, was enough to show that he would have approved and signed anything that Mr. Clay would have approved and signed. Now, he would ask with what consistency could Mr. Tyler, after being in favor of Mr. Clay's selection for the Presidency, who was known to be the advocate of a United States bank, pretend that he was not looked upon as being also in favor of that measure?

Mr. BIDLACK begged leave to interrupt the gentleman, and ask him if Mr. Clay himself had not, on various occasions, and particularly at Hanover court-house, disclaimed that he was in favor of a national bank.

Mr. UNDERWOOD had never heard any such disclaimer imputed to Mr. Clay since the Harrisburg convention. If there had been any such disclaimer, he would thank the gentleman to show it.

Mr. BIDLACK said that such a disclaimer had twice before been brought to the notice of the House; and in a speech which he had made, he had produced the proof from documentary evidence. He referred particularly to the Hanover speech.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that the speech would speak for itself. He was not aware of any such evidence. But if Mr. Tyler was not pledged to approve the measures of Mr. Clay—if he was desirous to nominate him for the Presidency, and actually shed tears, as it was said, because he did not receive the nomination, were there not good grounds to believe that he would approve a national bank bill? What were they to say in regard to the testimony of Hill and Owen of North Carolina, who testified that Mr. Tyler expressly told them that his opinions in relation to a national bank had undergone a change? He had not heard the veracity of these gentlemen questioned; and yet here was a direct issue between them and Mr. Tyler on this subject.

Mr. WISE would inquire of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, whether, during the canvass for the Presidency of 1840, he saw the address which was put forth by the Central Harrison Committee of Virginia? That address was published in all the Richmond papers; and it would be found there asserted, not only that Mr. Tyler would not sign a bank bill, but that General Harrison would not sign one. He would ask the gentleman if he ever read that address.

Mr. UNDERWOOD did not recollect that he had ever read it. He did not refer to these numerous addresses, made throughout the country during the presidential canvass.

Mr. RAYNER asked leave to make an explanation, as reference had been made to two gentlemen of his State. The charge they made was, that Mr. Tyler positively informed them that his opinions upon the constitutionality of a bank of the United States had changed. This was published in the papers of the country; and Mr. Tyler dodged the question, by saying that he never expressed any such opinion in the Harrisburg convention.

Mr. WISE observed that, if his friend from Kentucky would permit him, he would undertake to say that the President had denied that he ever made any such declaration at all. The gentleman need not, therefore, say that he dodged the question. The President had denied, and published to the world the denial, that he made any such declaration whatever to Gen. Owen, Mr. Hill, or anybody else.

Mr. UNDERWOOD observed that his time was drawing to a close, and he would, therefore, go on with his remarks, and, as he hoped, without any more interruptions. The Virginia Whigs might have written and published an address, such as the gentleman alluded to, and it might have been designed to operate on that State alone. The great error of the Whig party, and for which he believed the judgment of Heaven had fallen upon them, was their selecting John Tyler as their candidate for the Vice Presidency, in the hope of carrying the State of Virginia. Instead of selecting a man who was known to have co-operated with them in all their measures; instead of selecting a man who for years had manifested a consistent devotion to their principles, the Whig party selected John Tyler, merely for the sake of carrying the State of Virginia. Having made this selection, it was very probable that the Whigs of Virginia may have put forth such an address intended for that State only; but it was known that at Nashville the convention put forth resolutions directly the contrary, and in favor of a bank of the United States. We learn (said Mr. U.) wisdom by experience; and no man will, in future, get on the Whig ticket except on principle. The contest would then be carried on on principles alone. He himself should retire to the shades of private life; see his own corn grow, and raise his own lambs. But, as an American citizen, he should take a lively interest in the coming contest, and he hoped to see it waged on great principles, and not on the mere scramble for place of political aspirants.

He concluded by expressing it as his belief that the next Presidential contest would be decided upon the question as to whether there should be a national currency, based on individual funds; on the question of distributing the proceeds of the public lands to the States, to whom, as he thought, they rightly belonged; on the question of restricting the power of the Executive by limitations upon it, through an amendment to the Federal Constitution; and on all those other measures which had become the standard faith of the Whig party. When the contest turned on questions like these, he as firmly believed that the people would decide it in favor of the ascendency of the Whigs, as he now believed he was talking to the House of Representatives. It must be so, or the institutions of the country could not be preserved. Without it, they would not be worth preserving.

Mr. EVERETT said that the principal object he had in view was to bring this debate to a close, by moving the previous question. He would submit, as an apology for so doing, that there were now three or four subjects before the House, upon which, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] well remarked, the same speeches might be made. On all of them, a collateral debate had arisen, without regard to the matter immediately before the House. Before he took his seat, however, he had a word or two to say upon the question now pending. When the exchequer plan was committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, it would be recollected that he moved to instruct the committee to report the identical bill as submitted by the President, with a view of coming to a direct vote upon it. He considered such a course to be due to the Executive. It was presented to Congress as the peculiar measure of the President, and he thought it due to that officer that the House should express a direct opinion upon it. This was not the first time it had been recommended by the Executive; and, on that account, the course which he (Mr. E) had suggested was the more important. This repetition of the Executive recommendation was a still greater reason why the House should come to a decision upon the measure.

But it was also recommended in other quarters, of which he would give the origin and history. At the close of the extra session of the present Congress, a member of the cabinet, (Mr. Webster,)—the only member of the Harrison Cabinet who remained in office—wrote a letter, in which he pledged himself that the Executive should recommend some measure which would give relief to the country. That member of the cabinet pledged his reputation that such a measure should be brought forward. After that period, he (Mr. E.) always considered this (the exchequer) to be the measure of that member of the cabinet—drawn up by him, and originating with him. Indeed, when the report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the plan was sent to Congress, it was considered by every one as the argument of the member of the cabinet to whom he referred. At the last session, it was not favorably received. A committee of the friends of the President, to whom it was referred, made vital alterations in it, and no action was taken by the House upon the report. It now came to Congress with another Executive recommendation. But he would first state the fact which occurred in the vacation: The Secretary of State, in a speech delivered by him at Faneuil Hall, again recommended it as the only measure which should be adopted—and adopted without modification. This recommendation was reiterated by the Secretary of War. Now, it struck him, that there was an almost unparalleled degree of recklessness exhibited in the recommendations of these two Secretaries. They must have known that it had no chance whatever of being adopted; yet the recommendation of it to favorable consideration would hereafter give them an opportunity to say that, had their counsels been taken, the country would greatly have been benefited.

He held that this measure contradicted all those grounds on which the party to which those two Secretaries were attached had fought the political battle of 1840. The main issue then was upon the sub-treasury; and that was condemned, because it was a Government bank in disguise. It was objectionable because it gave too much power to the President, and because, if managed (as it would be) by politicians, it would soon run into bankruptcy. This measure of the exchequer would carry out the obnoxious principles which the Whig party predicted would result from the sub-treasury. He agreed with the Secretary of State in the opinion that both the bill reported by the committee of the friends of the President in the House, and that reported in the Senate, would be injurious. The President's bill he did not doubt would have the effect of enlarging the currency; but it would, at the same time, enlarge the power of the Executive; and therefore was liable to the same objection as the sub-treasury. The proposition, he apprehended, was never made with the expectation that it would receive Whig votes, but was addressed to the other side of the House. And why did it not find favor with the Democratic party? He answered, because they would never avow that the object of the sub-treasury was to create a Government bank, whilst this bill did so plainly. That party never could be induced to say that the sub-treasury was intended to be, or could become, a Government bank. Should it be adopted by a Democratic Congress, he had no fear of its being vetoed; because, if fairly established and put under way, it would become a bank of discount and circulation, as the exchequer would be.

He believed that the opinion of the country—certainly that of the House—was made up upon this measure; and as it was now before the House in such a way as to exclude the transaction of all other business so long as it remained undisposed of, (the suspension of the rules having given it preference,) in order to take it out of the way of other matters, he would move the previous question, and also a call of the House.

Mr. CUSHING said he hoped the gentleman would not persist in his motion—making a speech attacking all the world around him, and then permitting no one to reply. Such, indeed, was strange generosity.

Mr. EVERETT asked for the yeas and nays on the motion for a call of the House.

They were ordered.

Mr. ATHERTON suggested to the gentleman [Mr. EVERETT] to withdraw his motion, and move an adjournment; so as to let the question stand over until to-morrow, when it could be taken early.

Mr. EVERETT consented to withdraw the motion for a call of the House, and withdrew the motion for the previous question for a moment, in order to enable him to submit an amendment to the resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means. He moved to amend the resolution, by striking out the word "not;" the effect of which amendment would be to declare the plan of an exchequer "expedient."

He then renewed his motion for the previous question.

Mr. ATHERTON moved an adjournment; but withdrew the motion for a moment, at the request of Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON, who presented the proceedings of the people of Erie county, Pennsylvania, in favor of the issue of $200,000,000 Government stock, to be divided among the States.

Mr. WINTHROP rose and said that, as this was an adverse report, and the usual course of such reports was to lay them upon the table, he moved that this whole subject be laid on the table.

Such being the state of the question—

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 12, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury, covering a report made agreeably to the sixth section of the act for the extension of the loan of 1841, and for an addition of five millions thereto, and for allowing interest on treasury notes due; showing that there had been borrowed under that act the sum of of $5 672,976 88; and that $16 155 of that amount was obtained at 5½ per cent., $3,213,791 86 at 5½ per cent., and $2,443,030 02 at 6 per cent.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the communication was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, the resolutions of the Legislature of Connecticut, requesting Congress to adopt measures for disciplining the officers commanding the militia throughout the United States, which was presented and ordered to be printed a few days ago, was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. DAYTON presented a memorial, signed by sundry persons, against the repeal of the bankrupt law; and requesting, in any modification of the law by Congress, that the essential features of the law, as now existing, may be retained. Mr. D. said he did not know from what quarter the petition came, but begged leave to state that, in presenting it, he did not wish it to be received as any indication of what his course would be in the action upon the bill to repeal the law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of Mary Tucker.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to which was referred the House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Hoover, and Abelard Guthrie, and Edmund Ogden," reported the same back with an entire substitute for the bill, which was read.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of William G. Sanders.

Mr. G. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Teackle Savage, administrator of Bolitha Laws, made a report adverse to its passage; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Judiciary Committee, to which was referred House bill for the relief of David W. Haley, made a report adverse to its passage; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition from John Hutchins, praying to be allowed a pre-emption right to a certain tract of land.

Also, a petition from Thomas L. Somerall, praying for the confirmation of a certain entry of public land, made while he was register of the land office at Mount Salus, Mississippi.

Also, a petition from John Fletcher, representative of William Taylor and Robert Elliott, praying confirmation to a certain tract of land, or an equivalent therefor.

And also the petition of Zachariah Dixon, praying for the right of pre-emption to 160 acres of land; which several petitions were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. W. also presented a petition from William Dowsing, register of the land office for the north-eastern district of Mississippi, praying to be reimbursed moneys paid by him for clerk-hire; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KING remarked that on yesterday the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle, on certain terms, the liabilities of the sureties of Gordon D. Boyd, late receiver of public moneys at Columbus, Mississippi, was rejected. He was opposed to the resolution as I stood, and voted against it. Since then, he had examined it, and had come to the conclusion that it might be passed in such form as to guard more effectually the interests of the United States. He therefore moved that the vote rejecting it be reconsidered.

The question was put, and the vote was reconsidered.

Then, on motion by Mr. KING, the resolution was recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FULTON, on leave, introduced a bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable the claimants to lands within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the 26th of May, 1824, and an act to amend the same, and extending the provisions of said act to claimants to land within the States of Louisiana and Mississippi; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The following bills were taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading, viz:

House bill for the relief of Isaac and Thomas S. Winslow.

House bill for the relief of Burr & Smith.

House bill for the relief of Ferdinand Seibert.

House bill for the relief of Elisha Moreland, William M. Kennedy, Robert J. Kennedy, and Mason E. Lewis.

House bill for the relief of Peter Lionberger.

House bill for the relief of John R. Delany.

House bill for the relief of James M. Morgan.

House bill for the relief of Cornelius Wilson and James Canter.

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Samuel Shannon, deceased."

The bill to authorize the Legislatures of the States of Arkansas and Tennessee to sell lands heretofore provided for the use of schools in those States, was taken up as in committee of the whole on an amendment from the Committee on Public Lands—being an entire substitute for the bill, and making its provisions of general application.

The substitute, after being amended on the suggestion of Mr. YOUNG, was adopted, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the owners, officers, and crew of the armed brig Warrior, or their legal representatives," was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. EVANS remarked that the Committee on Finance had examined the bill, and made a report adverse to its passage. He therefore moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The question was put on the motion, and carried in the affirmative.

Senate bill to authorize the sale of school lands in the State of Illinois, and to legalize such sales as have been made prior to the passage of this act, was taken up; and, on the motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, (who said the object of the bill was provided for in the bill on the same subject already acted upon,) was laid on the table.

The bill to indemnify claimants for spoliations committed by the French prior to 1800, came up in order as in committee of the whole; and, without action thereon, was, on the motion of Mr. ARCHER, laid on the table for the present, with a view to await the action of the House on the same subject.

Senate bill declaring the assent of Congress to the State of Illinois imposing a tax on all lands heretofore sold by the United States in that State, from and after the time of such sale, was taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Solicitor of the Treasury, on the subject of the claims of the first municipality of New Orleans to the square of ground on which the custom house of that city is constructed; which, on motion by Mr. CONRAD, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

OREGON TERRITORY.

The bill to authorize the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, came up as the unfinished business; the question pending being, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. SEVIER said the select committee, to whom the subject of the settlement of the Oregon Territory had been referred, had endeavored, in considering the subject, to effect two objects—one was the preservation of our national faith, and the other was the preservation of our rightful possessions west of the Rocky Mountains. And the committee believed that those two objects will be effected by the passage of the bill they have submitted to the Senate.

It was gratifying to him to find that every Senator conceded the point, that our right to the territory in question was incontestable. That question had been well settled.

He had in his possession documents which set forth, in brief and comprehensive terms, the claim of the United States.

Mr. Gallatin had claimed for the United States the possession of this territory, on these grounds:

"The first discovery of the Columbia, by Gray; the first exploration of the territory through which that river flows, by Lewis and Clarke; and the establishment of the first posts and settlements in the said territory, by citizens of the United States:

"The virtual recognition by the British Government of the title of the United States, in the restitution of the post near the mouth of the Columbia, agreeably to the first article of the treaty of Ghent, without any reservation or exception whatsoever:

"The acquisition by the United States of all the titles of Spain, which titles were derived from the discovery and exploration of the coasts of the region in question, by Spanish subjects, before they had been seen by the people of any other civilized nation:

"And, lastly, upon the ground of contiguity, which should give to the United States a stronger right to those territories than could be advanced by any other power. 'If,' said Mr. Gallatin, 'a few trading factories on the shores of Hudson's Bay have been considered by Great Britain as giving an exclusive right of occupancy as far as the Rocky Mountains—if the infant settlements on the more southern Atlantic shores justified a claim thence to the South Seas, and which was actually enforced to the Mississippi—that of the millions of American citizens already within reach of those seas, cannot consistently be rejected. It will not be denied, that the extent of contiguous country to which an actual settlement gives a prior right, must depend, in a considerable degree, on the magnitude and population of that settlement, and on the facility with which the vacant adjacent land may, within a short time, be occupied, settled, and cultivated by such population, compared with the probability of its being occupied and settled from any other quarter. This doctrine was admitted to its fullest extent by Great Britain, as appeared by all her charters, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, given to colonies established then only on the borders of the Atlantic. How much more natural and stronger the claim, when made by a nation whose population extended to the central parts of the continent, and whose dominions were by all acknowledged to extend to the Rocky Mountains.'"

These were the points upon which our claim was based. It was unnecessary to trouble the Senate by going any further into the evidence of our title. Our discovery of the country drained by the Columbia river had been made as early as the year 1792. But our claim did not rest alone upon priority of discovery, but also upon a treaty of cession with Spain, by which the title of Spain to the country in question, in 1819, became the property of the United States. We had not, in the year 1792, any settlement west of the Mississippi river, which then belonged to Spain; and, in fact, but few settlers west of the Allegany mountains. We had no State west of the Ohio river or of the Allegany mountains; and it was therefore a matter of no consequence whether we owned the territory at that early period or not. But in the year 1803, when the treaty with the French Republic was made, it had become important that we should possess that portion of country, for the purposes of trade, for the sake of the fur trade and of the lumber trade; but most of all was it important for the purpose of protecting our settlements from the Indians, who were tampered with, as had always been the case, by the English. Hence it would be found that Mr. Jefferson had, as early as 1804, recommended to Congress an appropriation for the exploration of the Missouri, and the country west of the Rocky Mountains. Lewis and Clarke were accordingly authorized to explore the Missouri river to its sources, and thence the country west of the Rocky Mountains to the ocean; and they were the first who explored the tract of country lying along the course of that river, and west of the Rocky Mountains. Pursuing the same object, Mr. Madison granted facilities for the establishment of a colony at the mouth of the Columbia, upon the application of Mr. Astor. A settlement was formed, and a fort erected, and an important commerce was established with Russia and with China. But when the war of 1812 broke out, that coast being under the control and in the possession of renegades, it was given up to a British armed force, without firing a gun. Had there been a sufficient force, the result would probably have been different. But the place was surrendered; and it continued to be occupied by the British until the treaty of 1818, when our commissioners required its surrender, and it was given up. But, the British having occupied the country for so long a period—from 1812 until 1818—they had been enabled to erect a line of forts, and to extend their settlements over the whole country; and, when our people came again into possession, they found themselves under considerable disadvantage—all the most important points being preoccupied by the English; who had taken care also to instil into the Indian tribes such a hatred of our people, that it was dangerous for them to attempt forming a settlement at all. They were compelled, in some cases, to abandon their forts. And, when an attempt was made, in 1818, to settle the line of boundary, the British refused to come to any terms. They desired to navigate the Columbia river, and, in fact, to command the whole country. The consequence was, that certain stipulations, by which the country was to be occupied in common for the space of ten years, were entered into. If Senators would for a moment turn their attention to the terms of those stipulations, they would find that no provision was contained in them by which the settlement of that tract of country was prohibited or prevented. Each nation had the right to claim access to the ports of the other, for the purposes of trade and commerce. There was no provision by which settlement was restricted. He had procured a work, which was prepared for the State Department, by Greenhow, in which this arrangement will be found, and in which much other valuable information, connected with the discovery and settlement of that country, is also to be found.

The British had extended their settlements everywhere; and not only had they done this, but they had gone on and attached the whole of that country to the province of Canada, appointed justices of the peace, and were administering their laws throughout that country.

What was it that we now proposed to do? We proposed to endeavor to get possession of what we were entitled to, and of which we had for so long a time been kept out of possession. By passing this bill, we should extend to our settlements that protection and encouragement they so much needed. The bill had been more carefully drawn than that which passed the British Parliament; for provision had been made that, in all cases, persons claiming to be British settlers should be handed over to the British authorities for trial; whereas they made no such concession on their part, but, on the contrary, compelled every aggressor to be tried by her laws, as administered in the courts of Canada, and the smaller offences by justices of the peace within the territory.

Mr. LINN here stated the additional fact, that the British even claimed the right to exercise jurisdiction over the Indian tribes, and had actually tried and executed Indians for capital offences.

Mr. SEVIER proceeded to observe that this bill had been framed with a view to as great liberality as possible. It provided for the building of a chain of forts across the mountains. The British had been building forts themselves everywhere; they could not, then, find fault with us for doing what they had already done.

Now, what were the objections which were raised against the passage of this bill? One objection was, that by it we grant lands to settlers. He (Mr. S) looked upon this as the very life and soul of the bill. Strike out this provision, and you would have no settlers there; but, on the contrary, the country would remain in the possession of the British henceforth and forever.

Look at the situation of the country. Consider the distance from the confines of Missouri to be traversed by settlers—through a country, too, filled with Indians, many of them hostile—a country through which there was no road, and in which they could only subsist by their skill and success as hunters. They would have to traverse the mountains amid hostile bands of Indians, and afterwards descend the river, where they would meet the British—worse antagonists than the Indians. They would have then to establish their settlements, make their improvements, and erect their mills; this would be a work of time, requiring two or three years; and until this was done, they would have to subsist upon the fish of the river and the game of the woods. Was it reasonable to suppose that any one would be willing to encounter these difficulties and dangers without the hope of reward? No. In his opinion, the bounty was too small. He did not believe they would get a single settler to go there. If the land clause was stricken out, they might as well destroy the whole bill; they would then have a line of forts erected, without settlers to be protected; they would have forts to protect nobody, for nobody would go there. They would settle on this side of the mountains, where there were no difficulties to be encountered. For his own part, he would rather see the bounty quadrupled. He was sorry to hear so much said about the power of Great Britain, and our fears of her power. He disliked to hear these appeals made to our fears.

Though Great Britain had filled the whole world with dread, yet he hoped to see one nation, at least, that would not succumb to her aggression—and that nation was the United States. He hoped to see this country carry out her laws, regardless of what Great Britain might think or do. This country had already experienced aggressions on the part of Great Britain. The public mind was a little sore on this subject. He would dislike to see them repeated, though he did not fear the power of England. On a late occasion he had voted to take possession of a tract of country claimed by Great Britain. And he was not alone in that vote—he had with him the Senator from Missouri—and not succeeding, he had voted for the treaty. He had grown tired of negotiations at that time, and was more so now; and he believed other Senators were also.

In regard to this subject, he desired some action should take place. We had a right to the whole of that country, from the Mexican to the Russian possessions—all of it that was worth claiming;—for south of 42 degrees parallel, there was not sufficient rain for agricultural purposes. The only portion fit for cultivation was from 42 degrees to 49 degrees of north latitude. If the British were confined to the country north of the 49th parallel of latitude, they could have no other object in remaining there but the carrying on of the fur trade, that would soon be exhausted; and when that is exhausted, that whole coast, both by British and Russians, will be abandoned, and, of consequence, virtually fall into our possession.

He believed the possession of that country was highly important to this Government, for the purpose of carrying on our trade in the Pacific ocean with China and Russia. It was important that we should have a place where our vessels might go for supplies and for repairs; they were now obliged to resort to the Sandwich Islands for these purposes. He considered it important, also, in order to preserve peace upon our frontier. He would be in favor of putting in operation the principles advanced by Mr. Monroe, in his message to Congress in December, 1823.

Mr. Monroe said that

"The occasion had been judged proper for inserting as a principle, in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for colonization by any European power."

This is a sentiment to which he most cordially responded; and in order to carry it out to the letter, he was willing to encounter some difficulties and dangers. He would be willing, if our financial condition would justify it, to vote a million or two of dollars to build a railroad from the frontiers of Missouri, up the valley of the river Platte, to its source in the Rocky Mountains; and on this road, between these points, which could be travelled in two or three days, carry all our emigrants and their effects, for a year or two, free of cost or charges. But, unfortunately, we have not got the money for making such a road, although over such a country, which is level and a prairie, where there would be no grading of consequence, and no timber or obstructions to remove; it would cost comparatively but a trifling sum—perhaps a million and a half, or two millions of dollars. I would at this time prefer such an expenditure of the public money, to any distribution of it to the States.

He was sorry to find Senators objecting to pursue this course, for fear of giving offence to Great Britain. She had been extending her settlements south of the Columbia river, and she had erected forts; but the building of forts alone by us, without inducing settlers to migrate, would as speedily set us by the ears with Great Britain, as if we made the grants. These were the views he entertained in relation to the subject. He hoped, therefore, the bill would pass, as he believed it was highly important to the interests of this country that the Territory of Oregon should be settled and protected.

Mr. BENTON addressed the Senate for considerably more than an hour. It is not possible to do justice to his remarks till published in full. At present, all that can be given is a mere outline of some of the leading points which he urged.

He reviewed the gradual increase of the British pretensions to the northwest coast, and showed that up to 1818 nobody heard of her having any to the Territory of Oregon. Then, on her refusal to accede to a just settlement of boundary, she laid a nest-egg for a future claim of right, by a stipulation for joint occupation and settlement. Before the ten years of that stipulation had expired, she had hatched this nest-egg into a chicken, that flapped its wings and crowed defiance; and she said that British interests had grown up on the Columbia river, which she should and would protect. And from that day to this, she had been following up this avowal, by encouraging her fur companies to make settlements in, and to occupy the most valuable portions of, the territory. Through the agency of these companies, and the advantages enjoyed by her subjects of importing into the country British and foreign goods duty free, she had rendered the various Indian tribes of the whole region tributary to her; our citizens were compelled to abandon all competition with her traders; many of them were either murdered or expelled by the Indians. And to talk of joint occupation was absurd; for, according to the doctrines now held in regard to the treaty of 1818, she practically is to have all the trade and occupation, and we are to refrain from taking the same steps she has taken.

Mr. B. took an extensive review of the title of the United States, and also of the claims set up at different periods of time by Great Britain. He showed the position of the question at the time Mr. Adams was Secretary of State, and that then not one word of her present extent of pretensions was heard.

Throughout every administration, from the foundation of the Government to the present time, the grounds of our title, as well as of the British pretensions, were openly and freely discussed in the face of the world. Every negotiation on the subject—every proposition to or by our Government—was instantly and openly communicated to Congress, and given to the people. We had nothing to conceal. We avowed and maintained our title, in the face of the world; and we made no propositions that we could be ashamed of. Now, for the first time, it is found that, on a requisition from the Senate of the United States for information from the Executive as to the reasons why this question was not settled with other questions lately adjusted by treaty, and for information as to the propositions made by both Governments for its settlement, it is said it is incompatible with the interests of the country that the information should be given. Publicity might be incompatible with the honor of the administration making such propositions or concessions as it was to be feared were made to the British negotiator; but it never could be incompatible with the interests of this country, which never had, and never can have, anything to keep secret in regard to her title to anything she lays claim to.

As to the idea that had been thrown out, that we could not, if we threw ourselves upon our rights, maintain the country against Great Britain, and any attempt to do it would precipitate a war, which would lose us the whole territory—he utterly repudiated it as a gross fallacy. When we were, as a nation, much younger, less populous, and less powerful, we not only held our own against Great Britain, but humbled her. Now that we are eighteen millions, with an annual increase of at least three per centum, it was not to be supposed that we should fear her threat of war. It had been said that she could, from her access by sea, and through the facilities of her establishments already in the hands of her fur traders, and their influence over the Indian country, pour into the territory thousands of troops to expel our citizens. But, should she attempt this, what might be the consequence to herself at home—at her own doors? What the effect of twenty or thirty thousand of our choicest spirits poured into Ireland, to assist that nation to recover its independence?

Great Britain would never want a pretence for war, when she should deem it her interest to relinquish peace. All her dispositions and arrangements are to place herself in a position for aggressive war. Her grasping policy circumvented the globe. She was daily encroaching on the territory of every other nation; while no other nation in the world was claiming any of hers. The day could not be distant when such a power must be involved in war. He might not live to see it, but there were those now in the years of manhood, who would live to see the consequence of her arrogance. When that war with us comes, which is so often threatened, the price she will have to pay for it is not alone the loss of her Hudson bay territories and the Canadas, but the dismemberment of her own kingdom by the independence of Ireland.

Mr. MOREHEAD obtained the floor; and, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 12, 1843.

Mr. JOHN C. EDWARDS presented a petition from sundry citizens of Missouri, praying the establishment of a post route from Fort William, in Franklin county, Missouri, to Little Poney post office, in Pulaski county, Missouri: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. RIDGWAY presented a memorial, signed by 13 members of the bar of Chilicothe, Ohio, praying Congress to restore the summer term of the United States circuit and district courts to Columbus, the seat of government of Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorials of the same character, signed by 141 citizens of Columbus, and others, all citizens of Ohio; which were referred to the same committee.

Mr. SHAW presented the petition of John McClintock and others, citizens of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, praying indemnity for French spoliations on American commerce prior to the year 1800.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired what would be the first business in order.

The SPEAKER said that the committees would be called on for reports; after which, during the morning hour, the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] in relation to General Jackson's fine, would come up for consideration.

The committees were then called on for reports.

JOINT RULE IN RELATION TO CLAIMS.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, reported an additional joint rule which had been adopted by the Senate, with a recommendation that it be adopted.

The SPEAKER was about to put the question on the engrossment of the rule, when

Mr. HOPKINS called for its reading.

It was then read as follows:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the following be added to the journals of the two Houses of Congress, to wit:

Whenever a claim against the United States of any description has been or shall be presented to either House, and referred to a committee, and such committee shall have made a report in writing against the allowance of the claim, and the same shall have been concurred in by such House, it shall not be in order to revive the consideration of such claim in that House, at the same or any future session of Congress, either by bill, resolution, petition, or otherwise, except upon a memorial of the claimant, first setting forth, upon affidavit, that he has discovered new evidence in support of his claim since the decision against it, and a statement of the substance of such evidence; or, second, assigning specific errors in the report of the committee adverse to it: Provided, That an order discharging a committee from the further consideration of a claim, shall in nowise require a compliance with this rule.

Mr. TALIAFERRO opposed the proposition, and asked for information.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN called for its reading; and it was again read. [Cries of "Good;" "That's right."]

Mr. GIDDINGS advocated the proposition.

Mr. TALIAFERRO contended that it would be unjust to adopt such a rule, without giving previous notice to the country.

Mr. GIDDINGS rejoined.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN took the ground that it would be unjust, and be committing a gross piece of injustice to adopt such a rule. He doubted the right of Congress to cut off the right of appeal to the equity, justice, and consideration of a future Congress.

Mr. GRAHAM advocated the proposed rule; and contended that it was rendered necessary by the constant practice of presenting the same claim over and over again for years, after it had been rejected by each successive Congress.

Mr. EVERETT called for the reading of the resolution; which was again read.

Mr. EVERETT moved to lay the resolution on the table; but, at the solicitation of Mr. RAYNER, he withdrew it.

The debate was then continued by Messrs. RAYNER, TILLINGHAST, REYNOLDS, and HOPKINS, who concluded by renewing the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. GRAHAM called for the yeas and nays on the question; which being ordered, were taken, and resulted in yeas 80, nays 129.

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

The morning hour having expired, the resolution was therefore laid over till to-morrow.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired of the Chair what would be the next business in order?

The SPEAKER replied that the report and resolutions of the Committee of Ways and Means, together with the pending questions on that subject, were now in order.

Mr. FILLMORE said he would then appeal to the House to know whether they would not, by general consent, permit this subject to be laid over, with the understanding that the previous question should be withdrawn, and that the further consideration of it be postponed till Monday week, and made the special order of the day for that day. In the mean time, Mr. F. hoped that the printing of the extra copies of the report of the committee, and the minority report, would be ordered.

Mr. EVERETT made a few remarks, in too low a tone to be heard by the reporter.

Mr. BIDLACK observed that he should have no objection to the postponement, but that he had made a pledge yesterday to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] which he should like to redeem. That gentleman denied that he could furnish proof that Mr. Clay disclaimed a national bank during the late Presidential contest, and said that other expedients could be resorted to. Mr. B. was now prepared with the proof he alluded to, and wished to have an opportunity to show it.

Mr. FILLMORE hoped the gentleman would permit the question on printing to be taken first; and Mr. B. assenting—

The question on printing the extra copies was taken and carried.

Mr. FILLMORE hoped the question would be next taken on the postponement till Monday week

Mr. WISE wished it to be understood that the decision of this question was not to interfere with the going into the Committee of the Whole on the exchequer bill.

Mr. FILLMORE. Certainly.

Mr. CUSHING supposed also, with the understanding that the previous question should be withdrawn; which was also agreed to.

Mr. BIDLACK rose and asked permission to address the House, so as to redeem the pledge he made yesterday to the gentleman from Kentucky. He had the proof ready, and was prepared to produce it.

Mr. WISE presumed the gentleman could wait till Monday week, when the whole subject would come up.

Mr. BIDLACK said that he would not detain the House ten minutes.

Cries of "Hear him," "Hear him."

Objection being made—

Mr. CUSHING said that he would move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the exchequer bill. Should this motion prevail, the gentleman would have an opportunity to make all the explanation he desired.

Mr. RAYNER asked if the motion of the gentleman would not interfere with the repeal of the bankrupt act. If so, he was opposed to it.

Mr. CUSHING having called for the yeas and nays on his motion, the question was taken and resulted in yeas 101, nays 104, as follows:

Mr. HOLMES moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the French spoliation claims.

The motion was ruled out of order.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, the House resumed the consideration of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law, together with the various amendments thereto.

Mr. McKEON (who had the floor) resumed and concluded his remarks. He said he was aware that objections had been made to such a discussion as had been going on upon this measure; but if gentlemen would recollect the history of the House of Representatives, they must perceive that debates of this character would arise upon some subject brought before it during the session. He did not know a subject on which it was more proper than the present. It was a common thing in the House of Commons of England for both parties to discuss the measures of the ministry in general. It was also common in this country. In the present instance, the debate began with the majority of the House, upon the lead of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] who was followed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and then by two colleagues of his own, [Messrs. BOWNE and GORDON,] who separated from each other. As these gentlemen had defined their positions, he intended to place himself right—speaking his own individual opinions, and not those of any one else.

It had been suggested to him to inquire what the Democratic party should do, when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] said that if the Whigs would not support the administration, the President must get support from their opponents.

Mr. CUSHING desired to make a correction. He did not wish to be judged either by the construction or misconstruction of the gentleman.

Mr. McKEON said he would read from the gentleman's speech. He then read the following passage:

"Mr. C. would say to gentlemen of all parties in the House, and more especially to gentlemen constituting the majority in Congress, if you will not co-operate with the President in carrying on the Government, which is your highest duty, he must seek the aid of your adversaries."

Mr. CUSHING. "Carrying on the Government," not supporting the Administration.

Mr. McKEON. "Carrying on the Government." What did that mean?

Mr. CUSHING said he would explain its meaning.

Mr. McKEON said he could not yield the floor, as he had but forty minutes left.

Mr. CUSHING said he desired the House to observe this.

Mr. McKEON resumed, and again read from the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as follows:

"If you Whigs will lock the wheels of the Government, I trust aid will be found in the Democrats."

What were the measures of this Administration which the Democratic party were called on to applaud and support? One of the strongest measures of the last session—he meant the remedial justice bill, which took away from the State sovereignties a portion of their judicial power, and transferred it to the Federal courts—received the unbroken and undivided vote of the Democratic party against it. Yet this measure was recommended by the President in his message of December, 1841. The President then said:

"I cannot fail, however, to suggest to Congress the propriety, and, in some degree, the necessity, of making such provisions by law, so far as they may constitutionally do so, for the removal at their commencement, and at the option of the party, of all such cases as may hereafter arise, and which may involve the faithful observance and execution of our international obligations, from the State to the Federal Judiciary."

It was in pursuance of this recommendation that the remedial-justice law was passed by the majority in the House and the Senate. The Democratic party opposed it at every step; but it received the signature of the President, whom they were called on to support! Again: the ground taken by Mr. Webster (and, without doubt, sanctioned by the Executive) in his correspondence about the McLeod affair, was not approved by the Democratic party. Were they now asked to endorse it? Were they also required to acquiesce in the distribution bill, which the President signed, and which he decidedly recommended, provided it did not render an increase of the duties on imports above 20 per cent.? In December, 1841, after the passage of the bill, the President said:

"It might be esteemed desirable that no such augmentation of the taxes should take place as would have the effect of annulling the land-proceeds-distribution act of the last session, which act is declared to be inoperative the moment the duties are increased beyond 20 per cent., the maximum rate established by the compromise act."

Thus it seemed that the President was exceedingly anxious that the law should be carried into effect.

But, he asked, were the Democrats to find reason to support him on account of his course in the Rhode Island affair? Was it the loan bill which commended him to favor? The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] but the other day pictured the glories of the Administration in eloquent terms. Who before this Administration, in a time of profound peace, had ever witnessed the spectacle of an agent of the Government going about the streets of London to borrow money without success? Was that one of the glories of this Administration? At the last session, it asked for inordinate appropriations for the army and navy; but, under the lead of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CAVE JOHNSON,] a majority of the House reduced them to a more moderate standard. The President approved of the tariff bill, too, which was the worst ever passed by an American Congress; and on the very question upon which the Democrats staked their existence as a party, he defeated their wishes, by approving a bill to repeal the sub-treasury. And were they now asked to endorse all these acts? Upon what principle the support asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] was to be given, he could not undertake to say. He knew of none. The measures approved by the President were all Federal, and sustained by the majority of that party in Congress. But perhaps it was thought the Democratic party should support the President on account of his Democratic acts. He (Mr. McK.) would hereafter show that even in them he did not concur with the party.

He was glad that in the next Congress the strife would be one of principle. There was a radical difference between the two parties on the subject of the tariff, the bank, and the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. Did the President agree with the Democracy upon these subjects? As he understood the views of the President, that officer thought it was the duty of the Government to furnish a paper currency for the country. The Whigs were also in favor of a paper currency; but they thought it could be best applied through a national bank, whilst the President proposed that it should be afforded by means of an exchequer. The Democrats, on the other hand, declared that there should be no paper currency created by the Federal Government. Thus, it would be perceived, there was a sad difference between them.

Here Mr. CUSHING rose to ask a question, but

Mr. McKEON said he had no time to spare, and proceeded with his remarks. In 1834, the President differed with the Whig party about a bank of the United States. Still he declared that such an institution was expedient. Mr. Tyler then said that the Constitution should be amended. In his speech on the removal of the deposites, he held this language, speaking of the advantages of a United States bank: "Nor am I insensible to the beneficial influences it (has had) over the currency of the country; but I oppose it because it is unconstitutional." Again: "If my opinion could have any influence over the country, my advice would be, restore the deposites, and amend the Constitution." It was due to the President to say that his opinions on this subject had been on record for some time. His Whig friends should have inquired into them before they placed his name upon the ticket for the Vice Presidency.

As for the exchequer which the President sent to Congress, he held that it was the worst scheme for expanding the currency which he had ever yet seen, and more fraught with dangerous results. The Secretary of State had indeed shown how much he understood about currency, when he staked his reputation upon its good results.

In 1841, the President recommended, in strong terms, that the distribution law should be passed, and went on to show that it would be of immense benefit to the States, by relieving them from taxation. On this point, therefore, the President was at issue with the Democratic party; for they held that no distribution law should be passed, let the duties be over or under 20 per cent. Holding such a law to be unconstitutional, it mattered not with them whether there was an overflowing or an exhausted treasury.

The head of this Administration was elected as a Whig, and his Secretaries were identified with the Whigs of 1840. They still had command of the high places, and he knew not a man of them who had come to the conclusion to absolve himself from his union or identification with the Whig party, when battling against the Democrats in 1840. He would say to his colleague from Otsego, [Mr. BOWNE,] who seemed so anxious to throw open the doors of the Democratic church to Mr. Webster, that he must have spoken too quick. His colleague was not sure that Mr. Webster would come. Mr. Webster said he was a Whig, and always meant to be; and his colleague might himself get into the Whig party, instead of getting the Secretary of State into the Democratic party. The speech at Faneuil Hall contained this passage: "I am a Whig—always have been—always will be; and if any body undertakes to turn me out of the pale of that communion, let him see who'll get out first." Was this manifesting any disposition to come into the Democratic party? Were not all the opinions of Daniel Webster reflected in the recommendations to the House of Representatives? Was there no difference of opinion between him and the Democratic party on the subjects of the treaty, the tariff, and the currency? He (Mr. McK.) never expected to see the Democracy of Daniel Webster. Mr. W. so firmly believed in the truth of Federalism, and had so long stood forth as its illustrious champion, that he would never yield up that, in the defence of which he had acquired all his reputation.

He recollected another incident, when a difficulty occurred between this Government and France; during which (he said) he would not vote the appropriation if the enemy were thundering at the door of the Capitol. He recollected, too, and well, the declaration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that he had but another step to take, and that was into the ranks of the enemy; and he should never forget the enthusiasm which hailed that declaration, for it burst through all bounds. He went on to show that the gentleman now at the head of the State Department, though he might ask to be received into the Democratic ranks, could never expect to be trusted.

He then reviewed the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] which had been so much commented on during this debate; and made the declaration that, if it was meant that the veto power was to be used to aid the Executive in carrying on a war against the opposing party, nothing could have so great an influence in exciting the people of this country against the veto power as such an avowal. He enumerated various prominent questions, on which there was a clearly defined and irreconcilable difference on principle between the two prominent parties in the country; and showed the impossibility of forming a party by a combination of men holding such opposite principles to carry on the Government. The Administration must be carried on, on one or the other set of principles of the existing parties; and the man who expected that he could form a political rainbow of various colors, mistook the temper of the American people.

Mr. RAYNER said he voted for the bankrupt law at the extra session; and, as he meant to vote for its repeal, he desired to state the reasons which governed him in the vote he should give. He voted for the bankrupt law with some misgivings; but he yielded his doubts regarding its propriety, at the earnest entreaty of others, who deemed it essential to the well-being of the community. The people of North Carolina were less commercial in their pursuits than some other people of the United States; and, so far as they were concerned, he saw no pressing necessity for such a law; but he could not shut his eyes to the embarrassments and sufferings and distresses that were operating on the commercial and trading sections of the Union, crippling their energies, and tying up the hands of industry. And when he looked at the cause of those embarrassments and distresses, he saw the suffering portions of the community were not paying the penalty of their own imprudence, but were enduring miseries brought upon them by rash and wicked measures of financial quacks and political gamblers. It was a state of things growing out of twelve years of misrule, that aroused the country in 1840 to overthrow the self-styled Democratic party, and to bring in the Whig party to relieve the country as far as they could do so; and the maladministration which they came in to correct, forced upon them the bankrupt law. But since the causes which led to the passage of the bankrupt law no longer existed, or existed with much less force, he thought the question might now be entertained, whether there was a duty incumbent on them to keep the law any longer in existence. The objects of the law had been, in a great measure, accomplished. Those who had been thrown into insolvency by the maladministration of public affairs, had received the benefit of it; those whose energies and industry had been destroyed by the action of the Federal Government, were left free, and the manacles struck from their hands, and they could now pursue the onward course of enterprise and industry.

The mechanic had been released, and again sent to his shop; the sailor to his ship; the merchant to his counter; and the farmer to his plough. The beneficent action of the law had presented to them new fields for enterprise and labor, in which they might hereafter not only obtain the means of subsistence, but of paying the debts from which they had been released—debts which honor called on them to provide for when possessed of the ability to do so, though they were freed from all legal obligations. And while the honest and unfortunate had received the benefits of this law, the reckless and imprudent had been brought to a state of accountability, and the creditor on his part had received the benefits of it also. Notwithstanding the benefits of the bankrupt law, still there were evils in it, as there were in every finite system—a few of which he would now advert to. Although he voted for this law, considering that the objections to it were more than counterbalanced by the benefits he thought it would produce, yet he believed that these objections operated with greater force now than then. He also believed that the present state of things in the country, as well as public opinion, demanded its repeal. One great objection to it was, that its tendency would be, he feared, to destroy confidence, take away the means of obtaining credit, and thereby materially injure the business of the community. Capitalists would fear to trust men of business, because of the inducements held out to them to relieve themselves from debt in this easy and ready manner; while men would be tempted to run into hazardous and improvident speculations, from the belief that, if they failed, they could, with so little trouble, extricate themselves from their embarrassments. Another serious objection to this law, as a permanent system, was, that it came in conflict with, and unsettled, all the laws which the States had established for the regulation of the transactions between debtor and creditor. It was one of the essentials to a sound system of trade, that the relations of debtor and creditor should be put on a firm and permanent basis. Any law, therefore, that prevented or interfered with this state of things, was impolitic as well as unjust. There was still another reason why he would vote for a repeal of this law; and that was, that public opinion had settled down to the conviction that it ought to be repealed. He had, at the time of the enactment of this law, stated that his constituents would be but little affected by it, and that, therefore, they would care very little about it. He was still of that opinion; but, so far as they had agitated the subject, he believed that they were decidedly in favor of the repeal. Though willing, however, to vote for the repeal, yet he could not vote for it without some amendment as to the time when it should take effect. All those who had commenced the initiatory proceedings to avail themselves of the benefits of the act, had done so on the faith of the Government, and they had a sort of vested right in it. Further, it would not be just to exclude those creditors from its benefits, who had extended forbearance to their debtors to this time. Such a proceeding would operate as a punishment for the best and kindest feelings of human nature, and would be calculated to destroy all confidence in legislation. He was opposed to the amendment including corporations in the provisions of the bankrupt act, and agreed with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] that it would be the most dangerous exercise of power that could be witnessed in this Government.

After some remarks commenting pretty severely on the course of the President, and expressing the hope that the Whig party would revive again,

Mr. R. then went on to say that, however mortified he felt at many occurrences during this debate, he was yet gratified that it had taken place. It had served to draw more distinctly the lines of party, and had shown to the country (what he long knew) that there were but two parties in the House of Representatives. The Tyler faction were merged into the Locofoco party; and, amid the seething and boiling of the political caldron, the scum of that party was about to be thrown off.

Mr. R., in reply to various remarks made during the debate, spoke until the expiration of his hour.

Mr. T. F. MARSHALL then obtained the floor, but deferred his remarks until to-morrow.

THE UNITED STATES LOAN.

The SPEAKER submitted a communication from the Treasury Department, enclosing a report of the amount borrowed in pursuance of the bill to authorize a loan.

The communication not being opened, several gentlemen asked for its reading; whereupon the Clerk read the accompanying letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, from which it appeared that the amount borrowed under authority of the act of Congress was $5,672,976 88.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the communication be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of modifying so much of the law as requires the Secretary of the Treasury to report the amount of the loan effected under par value.

Mr. SPRIGG asked, was it not intended that the communication should be printed?

Mr. FILLMORE said it might not be prudent to print it.

The motion was then agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER submitted the following Executive communications:

A communication from the Navy Department, containing a list of vessels built in the United States since 1826: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the War Department, covering the report of Capt. Hughes's reconnoissance of the Ohio river: referred, on motion of Mr. IRWIN, to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Navy Department, showing in what manner the contingent fund of that department had been expended: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, covering copies of the statement rendered by the incorporated banks of the District of Columbia: referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. S. MASON, the use of the hall, on Tuesday next, was granted to the Colonization Society.

Mr. ROOSEVELT gave notice of his intention to move a suspension of the rule appropriating three days to the consideration of Territorial business.

TRIAL OF LOUALLIER.

Mr. BARNARD rose and said, that as the Committee on the Judiciary wished to obtain information to aid them in their investigation of the matters before them relative to General Jackson's fine, he would ask the House to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to furnish to this House a copy of all the papers and proceedings to be found in his department relative to the arrest, and trial by court martial, under the orders of General Jackson, of E. L. Louallier, (or Mr. Louallier, jr.,) at New Orleans, in March, 1815.

SENATE BILLS.

The following bills from the Senate were severally twice read, and referred:

A bill for the relief of Elizabeth Monroe: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill for the relief of Joshua Drew was concurred in.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. MERIWETHER offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the propriety of reducing the number of commissioned officers of the army, corresponding with the reduction of privates; whether the army may not be further reduced, by disbanding one or more regiments of infantry, or the second regiment of dragoons; and whether a regiment or battalion of infantry may not be converted into marines.

PENSIONS IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a pension agency at Wytheville, Virginia, for the counties of Lee, Scott, Russell, Tazewell, Washington, Smyth, Wythe, Grayson, Carroll, Pulaski, Mercer, and Giles.

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 13, 1843.

On motion by Mr. BARROW, it was ordered that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn till Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the State Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 21st of August last, information obtained from the American consuls abroad as to the cost of all commodities imported by this country from foreign countries, at the places from whence imported, during the months of July, August, and September of the past year, with the rates of insurance, freights, &c.

On motion by Mr. WALKER, (on whose motion the information was called for,) the communication was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from the Utica and Schenectady Railroad Company, praying that the tariff law may be so modified as to allow two years further for the importing of railroad iron free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a memorial from citizens of Carrollton, Ohio, representing that they view, with feelings of deep regret and mortification, the gross injustice which has been done the Hon. Amos Kendall for "a desire faithfully to perform the duties of his office as Postmaster General, and to protect the public interest committed to his charge," in the suit and rendition of judgment against him, in his individual capacity, in favor of Wm. B. Stokes and others; and urge that, where a public officer acts and performs his duties "faithfully," the Government for which he thus acts should, in justice, protect and defend him in person and property in connexion with such performance. The memorialists, therefore, pray Congress to adopt some measures that will extricate Mr. Kendall from the difficulties growing out of his desire to guard the interests of the United States faithfully.

Mr. T. moved that the memorial be referred to a select committee. This proposition elicited some discussion as to the propriety of the proposed reference; in which Messrs. BERRIEN, GRAHAM, ARCHER, CONRAD, KING, WALKER, and TAPPAN participated.

The bill for the relief of John P. Skinner, and legal representatives of Isaac Green, was taken up as in committee of the whole; and, after some remarks by Messrs. Mr. MOREHEAD, being entitled to the floor, rose, and was understood to say that he had learned from his friends that, in consequence of the argument made yesterday by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] desired to reply. He, (Mr. M.,) therefore, most cheerfully yielded the floor. But, as the hour was late, he moved that the Senate adjourn.

The Senate then adjourned over to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 13, 1843.

Mr. MEDILL presented a petition from members of the bar, and other citizens of Lancaster, Ohio, praying the repeal of the law of the last session, removing the summer term of the circuit and district courts of Ohio to Cincinnati: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. READ presented a petition from sundry citizens of northern Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. WISE presented a memorial, signed by twelve hundred citizens of Baltimore and Baltimore county, praying Congress to pass the exchequer bill; which he moved to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion being carried,

Mr. WISE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the exchequer bill.

Mr. FILLMORE requested the gentleman to withdraw his motion for the present, to give him an opportunity to report a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means; which being assented to by Mr. WISE,

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the half calendar year beginning on the 1st January, 1843, and ending on the 30th June, 1843; and for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st July, 1843, and ending on the 30th June, 1844; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WISE then renewed his motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the exchequer bill.

Mr. EVERETT asked if the motion would require a vote of two-thirds, as in a suspension of the rules, or would a majority be sufficient.

The SPEAKER said that a majority could go into Committee of the Whole at any time.

Mr. MATHIOT called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered,

The question was taken and decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 128, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Barton, Bidlack, Bowne, Briggs, Bronson, Burnell, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John C. Clark, Mark A. Cooper, Cowen, Cushing, Dawson, John Edwards, Egbert, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Gwin, Hays, Houston, Hubard, Hudson, Hunt, Charles J. Ingersoll, Linn, Mitchell, Pickens, Plumer, Rencher, Ridgway, Roosevelt, William Russell, Sewell, Shields, William Smith, Snyder, Stokely, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Tomlinson, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Wood, and John Young—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Beeson, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Botts, Boyd, Milton Brown, J. Brown, Burke, Wm. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Wm. B. Campbell, Thos. J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Childs, Staley N. Clarke, Clifford, Clinton, Colquitt, Cranston, Daniel, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Everett, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Gordon, Graham, Halsted, Harris, Henry, Hopkins, Hunter, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, Jack, Cave Johnson, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, John P. Kennedy, Lane, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKennan, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mathews, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Morrow, Newhard, Osborne, Owsley, Parmenter, Partridge, Payne, Pearce, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Read, Reding, Reynolds, Riggs, Rodney, J. M. Russell, Sanford, Saunders, Shaw, Shepperd, Truman Smith, Sprigg, Stanly, Steenrod, A. H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Toland, Trotti, Van Rensselaer, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Yorke, and Augustus Young—128.

So the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole on the exchequer bill.

Mr. EVERETT moved a suspension of the rules, that he might move to take up the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. CUSHING said, as that would exclude all other business, and as this was private bill day, he would call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 119, nays 70.

The motion was not carried; the majority being less than two-thirds.

The joint resolution to bar a second application for claims against the Government, unless supported by new facts, which was under discussion yesterday during the morning hour, again came up in order.

Mr. PARMENTER opposed the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GIDDINGS advocated the passage of the resolution.

The SPEAKER then put the question of concurrence in the resolution, and pronounced that he thought the noes had it.

The yeas and nays were called for and ordered; but before they were taken,

Mr. BIDLACK, after some few observations on the necessity of some such rule, gave notice that, if it should be rejected, he would, at the first opportunity, introduce a resolution calling upon the Committee of Ways and Means to report on the expediency of bringing in a bill to appoint some officer whose duty it should be to examine those cases of private claims, cross-examine witnesses, and put cross-interrogatories.

Mr. ADAMS objected to the resolution, on the ground that it interfered with the right of petition, which was secured to the people by the Constitution. Already restrictions on that right existed, of which he did not approve. He urged the fact, that there was no other remedy to the claimant but to petition Congress. In this country, no man could sue the Government; whilst in England, there was a board of exchequer for the settlement of claims. In that country, a subject might even sue the King for justice. He also opposed the resolution on another ground. The Committee of Claims was, in fact, a court of justice, the members of which had a political interest in opposing claims. Members were prevented often from allowing claims, by the fear of being charged with extravagant expenditure of the public money. They were also, he had no doubt, sometimes influenced by party considerations in rejecting a claim. Therefore, he thought that a rejection once ought not to prejudice a claim ever thereafter.

Mr. HOLMES contended that this resolution proposed an important innovation in the practice of the House; and begged that the House would pause before it adopted a measure which might inflict so much injustice upon individuals.

Mr. ARNOLD argued in favor of the adoption of the resolution, and contended that it did not, as supposed by his venerable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] abridge the right of petition. He was induced to favor the resolution, on account of his experience on the Committee of Claims. He solemnly believed that nine out of ten of the claims presented here had no foundation whatever.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. GRAHAM and TILLINGHAST; when

Mr. BOTTS moved the following amendment:

"Provided, however, That this rule shall not operate as a bar to the presentation of any claims that may have, at a former session, passed either House of Congress."

After some remarks from Mr. BRIGGS, Mr. JOHN C. CLARK demanded the previous question.

Mr. STANLY asked the gentleman from New York to withdraw the call for the previous question, to allow him to offer an amendment, promising to renew the call.

Mr. J. C. CLARK assenting,

Mr. STANLY offered the following amendment to the amendment:

"And provided, further, That no committee of either House of Congress shall be permitted to employ a clerk, without permission being first obtained for that purpose."

Mr. STANLY, after explaining his reasons for offering this amendment, renewed the call for the previous question; which being seconded, and the main question ordered,

The first question was taken on Mr. STANLY'S amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question was next taken on Mr. BOTTS'S amendment; and it was also agreed to.

The question was then taken on concurring in the resolution as amended; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the result was—yeas 95, nays 103, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Aycrigg, Babcock, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Black, Boardman, Botts, Bowne, Brewster, Bronson, Milton Brown, Burke, William Butler, Green W. Caldwell, P. C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Wm. B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Chapman, John C.

Clark, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Cowan, Cranston, Daniel, Garret Davis, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Ferris, Fessenden, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmer, Gordon, Graham, Green, Harris, Houston, Hunter, Cave Johnson, Lane, Lewis, Linn, Littlefield, Abraham McClellan, McKay, Mathiot, Mathews, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Mitchell, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Pearce, Pendleton, Pickens, Pope, A. Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Reding, Rencher, Reynolds, Rogers, James M. Russell, Sanford, Saunders, Sewell, Shaw, Sheppard, Wm. Smith, Sprigg, Stanly, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Trotti, Turney, Warren, Washington, and Watterson—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Baker, Barnard, Blair, Borden, Boyd, Briggs, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Cary, Staley N. Clarke, Cross, Cushing, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Deberry, Doan, John Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Gates, Goggin, P. G. Goode, W. O. Goode, Granger, Gustine, Halsted, Hastings, Henry, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubard, Hudson, Hunt, C. J. Ingersoll, J. R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, King, Lowell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Thomas F. Marshall, Samson Mason, Mattocks, Medill, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Newhard, Parmenter, Partridge, Plumer, Powell, Proffit, Ramsey, B. Randall, Read, Riggs, Rodney, Wm. Russell, Saltonstall, Slade, Truman Smith, Snyder, Sollers, Stearod, Stokely, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Triplett, Van Buren, Ward, Weller, Westbrook, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Wood, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—103.

So the resolution was not concurred in.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, introduced the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the consideration of so much of the "estimates of appropriations for 1843 and 1844" as relates to the construction of a dike for closing Hog island channel, in Charleston harbor, South Carolina, and that the subject be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the estimates of appropriations for 1843 and 1844, as relates to the commencement of a work at Sandy Hook, New York; to the commencement of a fort on Sollers' point flats, Baltimore harbor; to the preservation of the site of Fort Caswell, Cape Fear, North Carolina; to the preservation of the site of Fort Moultrie, Charleston, South Carolina; to the commencement of a fort on the coast of Georgia; to the commencement of a fort between Mobile bay and the Rigolets, Louisiana; to the erection of barracks, quarters, and storehouses at Fort Gibson, Arkansas; and to the erection of forts and batteries on Staten island, New York harbor; and that those subjects be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of selling Fort Gansevoort and its site, (within the city of New York,) and of applying the proceeds to the purchase, from the State of New York, of the works and their site on Staten island.

Mr. HOLMES moved to amend the first resolution, by substituting the Committee on Military Affairs for the Committee on Commerce.

After a debate, in which Messrs. HOLMES, PICKENS, FILLMORE, GRANGER, and PROFFIT took part, the amendment was negatived, and the original resolutions were adopted.

Mr. TURNEY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill further to continue in force the act for the payment of horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish to this House a copy of the report heretofore made to him by Lieut. Wilkes, relative to his examination of Oregon Territory.

He also submitted a resolution (which was agreed to) ordering the printing of a certain map accompanying the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, respecting the erection of military posts in the Oregon Territory.

Mr. GIDDINGS called for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER announced the next business to be the question of reconsideration of the vote by which the bill for the relief of Philip Renault was carried, which, on previous days, has been debated at great length.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, who was entitled to the floor, spoke on the question at much length.

The question was then taken on the motion for reconsideration, and resulted in ayes 70, noes 43.

No quorum voting, tellers were called for and ordered; and, on taking the question, the motion was carried—ayes 86, noes 49.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill, when

Mr. YOUNG of New York, intimating his intention to address the House on the subject,

The House adjourned.

FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

The resolution introduced by Mr. BOWNE, to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to bring in a bill to refund the fine extorted from General Jackson at New Orleans, in 1815, by Judge Hall, came up as the business of the morning hour.

The amendment submitted by Mr. ADAMS, to refer the subject, with certain instructions, to the same committee, being the pending question—

Mr. HUNT (who had the floor) observed that, coming into the House as he did, at the commencement of the session, just recovering from a severe indisposition, he had prescribed to himself the course of a silent member, attending to the public business, and casting a silent vote as his conscience dictated. He should have adhered to that determination, but for the strange, and, to him, alarming legal proposition put forward by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL,] in connexion with the case now under consideration. Feeble as he was, he could not consent to give a silent vote upon the question stated by him, when that question had been placed on the ground assumed by the gentleman. He had been relieved somewhat from the effect produced by the startling proposition to which he had just alluded, in reference to the law that should govern this and similar cases—that was, in reference to the supremacy of civil over military law—in consequence of the ground on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. W. O. BUTLER] had placed it. He understood that gentleman distinctly to avow that General Jackson himself never claimed that the military was superior to the civil power; and he understood the gentleman further, in the course of his able and eloquent remarks, which were listened to by himself, as well as the House, with the greatest pleasure, distinctly to say that he placed the refunding of this fine upon the ground that General Jackson, under the circumstances in which he found himself, acted from an overruling necessity. If, therefore, the case was to come before the House placed on that ground, it was stripped of the objectionable features thrown round it by the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. A bill had been reported in the other House, proposing to refund this fine; and it was placed on the ground of the meritorious services rendered by General Jackson, without casting the slightest reflection upon the judge who imposed the fine, and giving no intimation that the military was superior to the civil power. It was placed on the ground that General Jackson, in the honesty of his motives, was placed under the necessity, for the time being, of prostrating or closing up the civil tribunals; or, to use his own language, proclaim martial law. He did not say that, placing it on that footing, he would vote for the refunding of this fine; all he meant to say was, that placing it on these grounds would relieve it from the objectionable features thrown around it by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Having but a brief portion of the morning hour left him, he proposed, as succinctly as possible, to place before the House his own views of the legal grounds on which this case rested; and, in order to do that more intelligibly, he should endeavor to present to the notice of the House the laws bearing on it, exclusive of any opinions of his own. If he succeeded in getting through with the legal question before the expiration of his hour, he should then, with the leave of the House, proceed to give his own opinions on it.

Now, in order to understand the principles which ought to govern this question, he asked the House calmly to consider what it was. Laying out of view many of the circumstances which it would be necessary to take into consideration, and which would take from General Jackson all pretence that the proclamation of martial law was indispensable to the preservation of the city he defended, he would present a statement of facts, according to dates, which it would be important to consider in coming to a decision on this question. The battle of New Orleans, as was known to all, was fought on the 8th of January, 1815; and, on the 3d of March following, an article appeared in the New Orleans Courier, signed "A Citizen of Louisiana, of French origin," and which article was written by a Mr. Louallier. On the 5th of March, Louallier was arrested by order of General Jackson; and, on the same day, application was made to Judge Hall, the district judge of Louisiana, for a writ of habeas corpus in his favor. The order was issued by the Judge; and, in issuing it, the writ was made returnable on Monday, the 6th. The Judge dated the order on the 6th. It was ascertained, before the writ was issued, or before it passed out of his control, that there was a mistake; and the Judge was called on to correct it, which was done by dating it the 6th. On the evening of that day the counsel of Louallier, at the suggestion of Judge Hall, apprized General Jackson of these proceedings, and that a writ of habeas corpus had been issued. On that day Judge Hall himself was arrested by General Jackson's order; and, on the morning of the 6th, before breakfast, a court-martial was appointed to sit on the life of Louallier. Judge Hall was kept in confinement from the 5th to the 11th or 12th, and then taken by a guard of regular soldiers without the limits of the city, and discharged. Gentlemen would find the truth of this statement in Senate Doc. No. 14 of the present session.

Now, the first question he wished to ask was this: had General Jackson any authority to declare martial law? He wished to meet this broad question, because he thought the time had arrived when it should be settled, while they could do it, instead of transferring it to posterity, when it would be more difficult of settlement. Had, then, General Jackson, or had any military officer, even in time of war, the right to proclaim martial law, and to suspend the civil proceedings of the tribunals of the country? It was important to answer this question; otherwise, it might become a precedent of most dangerous import hereafter. He undertook to show that neither General Jackson nor any other military officer had any such authority, (and on this point he thought the country was much indebted to a writer who had been often quoted on this floor, in opposition to the right to such authority of any military power;) but he did not contend that, in time of war, a military commander might not find himself placed in circumstances as described by a gentleman from Kentucky, who had preceded him in this debate, in which an overruling necessity might compel him to invade the rights of property and of persons; but of that necessity such officer must judge, and act at his peril. He admitted that the necessity might exist for a commander to burn houses and take property; but the Government would be under the necessity of making compensation for property so destroyed or taken; and as it was overruling necessity that afforded the law for such a procedure, there was not—there could not be—any provision made for it by law in advance. In illustration of this position, he showed that compensation was made for property destroyed in the defence of Baltimore.

He next quoted the 9th section of the 1st article of the Constitution, which provides that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it;" and he asked who was to be the judge of that necessity? Was it the President of the United States, or any subordinate officer in command? No; it was the Legislature of the country that was the judge, and the only judge, of that necessity. He supported this position by citing the practice of Mr. Jefferson, who in 1807, as President of the United States, applied to Congress for a temporary suspension of the writ of habeas corpus for three months; which, however, was refused by the House of Representatives, where the bill was defeated, which had passed the Senate for that purpose. Where, then, was the authority found by which General Jackson proclaimed martial law? It was certainly not in the Constitution; for he found no countenance for the exercise of it there; nor yet in the history of England, whence the habeas corpus, as well as the principles of freedom on which our system is based, was derived. The habeas corpus was one of the boons which the sturdy Barons wrested from King John at Runnymede; and when had there been any attempt to suspend it there? Besides, eminent legal authority had distinctly stated that the doctrine of military or martial law as laid down in Blackstone and Holt, had no application to England; and surely the inhabitants of this country ought to have as great protection for life and property, as was enjoyed there under that law.

He next glanced at the trial of Louallier by a drum-head court-martial, (for which he was understood to contend that General Jackson had no legal authority,) for the purpose of opposing the declaration of General Jackson's friends and defenders, that the imposition of the fine was a usurpation of authority, and an unjust judgment, which they were called upon to wipe away. By the citation of the articles of war, &c., he showed the authority of a commander, which, however, he asserted did not extend so far as General Jackson appeared to have supposed.

Thus he had presented one portion of his case. He had asked the friends of General Jackson to show him where General Jackson, or any other military commander, got his authority to suspend the writ of habeas corpus?—where he got his authority for the arrest and trial of Louallier by a drum-head court-martial? And he thought he had not left it on that ground, and with interrogations only; for he had shown affirmatively, on the other hand, that the Constitution guarantied the right of the writ of habeas corpus, except in urgent cases; and he had shown further the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, by his practice, and the action of the Legislature, in relation to an abrogation of that right, from which it was evident it was not conceded that a subordinate officer possessed such authority.

The SPEAKER here announced that the morning hour had expired.

Several Senate bills were read twice, and referred.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the annual statement of contracts made by the Navy Department for and during the year 1842, in behalf of the United States, sent to Congress in pursuance of the act of 3d of March, 1809; which letter and statement were laid on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from James D. Doty, Governor of the Territory of Wisconsin, enclosing a printed commu-

Accordingly, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Bacon, of Norwich, Connecticut, widow of the late passed midshipman Frederick Bacon, who was lost on board the Seagull, one of the vessels in the South Sea exploring expedition, praying Congress to pass a law allowing her the extra pay to which, by agreement, her husband was entitled for his services in the South Sea exploring expedition: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, without amendment, the bill for extending the Patent Office to 9th street.

Also, from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of Charles M. Keller, praying that so much of the patent law as prohibited any person in the Patent Office from taking out a right for inventions, be suspended, so as to extend the benefits of the patent law to an invention of his for propelling steamships, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to second reading.

Mr. KING presented a petition from Mr. Stewart, of Washington city, administrator of Captain William Walker, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to settle, on principles of justice and equity, the claim of said Walker for services in taking a delegation of Creek Indians to Washington, and for certain expenditures of money on their account, which was disallowed him by the disbursing officers: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PHELPS moved to take up the Senate bill No. 25, to authorize the settlement of the account of Joseph Nourse; which had been laid on the table, at his instance, some time ago.

The bill was accordingly taken up, as in committee of the whole, and read. No amendment being offered, it was reported back to the Senate; when

Mr. KING moved to strike out so much of the bill as awards interest to the claimant. He made strong objection to the whole principle of the bill, which had, within a few years, become a practice. The principle was, to get a decision of the courts in favor of a claim, without any authority from Congress to try the issue against the United States.

Mr. WALKER pointed out an act of Congress, in conformity with which the decision in this case had been made by the courts, and confirmed by the Supreme Court, upon points contended throughout by the district attorney. He said the interest allowed was only from the time of the decision in favor of the claimant.

Mr. KING called for the yeas and nays on his motion to strike out the portion of the bill allowing interest; which were ordered.

The motion resulted in the negative—yeas 16, nays 17.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The CHAIR announced that the unfinished business of last week was next in order, being the bill for the settlement and occupation of the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. CHOATE was entitled to the floor, but hoped the Senator from Missouri would have no objection to the bill being passed over informally till to-morrow.

No dissent being expressed, it was passed over informally.

The special orders were next called up; but,

Mr. PHELPS made an appeal to the Senate to take up a private bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown, jr.

On the motion to take up this bill, a quorum did not vote.

Mr. LINN said his only reason for voting in the negative was, that he thought the bill would interfere with the special orders; on one of which it might be the desire of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAPPAN] to address the Senate.

Mr. TAPPAN remarked that it was a matter of indifference to him when he should offer the few observations he had to make.

Mr. PHELPS explained the necessity which he conceived existed for taking up the private bill he had mentioned.

On the question to take it up, there were 14 ayes, and 14 noes.

So it was decided in the negative.

The special order then proceeded; being the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so as to limit the term of office of the judges of the supreme and inferior courts.

The joint resolution was read; and the question being on its adoption,

Mr. TAPPAN, by whom it had been introduced, explained at considerable length its objects and necessity.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut followed in a speech of much research, pointing out the difference between the Government of this country and that of England, and showing that the independence of the judges in Great Britain was proper against the sovereign power; but only proper here against the executive and legislative power, returning to the people at stated times their legitimate control.

Mr. BERRIEN did not suppose any considerable number of Senators could be in favor of any change; and therefore conceived it unnecessary to argue the subject. He merely called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question on the adoption of the joint resolution was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Fulton, Linn, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wilcox, and Woodbury—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Kerr, McDuffie, Mangum, Miller, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

Senate bill No. 65, for the relief of Samuel Dicey, was then taken up and ordered to a third reading. Also House bill, No. 397, for the relief of Mary Tucker.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 16, 1843.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petitions of L. F. Wheeler and six other merchants and shipmasters of Eastport; of James Moore and twelve other merchants and shipmasters of Machiasport; and of Barnabas Strout and nineteen other merchants and of shipmasters of Cherryfield—all praying for an appropriation to improve the navigation of Penobscot bay, Maine; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMER presented a petition, numerously signed by citizens of West Pennsylvania, praying for the unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. REYNOLDS presented petitions of citizens of the State of Illinois, praying a grant of a section of land to each male inhabitant of the age of twenty-one years, who shall emigrate to, settle on, and cultivate the soil in the Territory of Oregon; which petitions, together with proceedings of a public meeting of citizens of Alton, in the same State, upon the same subject, were referred to a select committee.

Mr. WISE rose to present two memorials—one from citizens of Baltimore, and the other from citizens of Philadelphia—in relation to the exchequer; which he moved to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ARNOLD objected to the presentation of those petitions, and to all other business that was out of order.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. CLIFFORD inquired if this was not resolution day, and if resolutions were not in order from the State of Maine. As the Speaker was understood to assent, he offered a resolution to the effect that the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report forthwith the following bill to repeal the bankrupt act. [The bill referred to in the resolution simply provided that the bankrupt law "be, and the same is, hereby repealed."]

Mr. ARNOLD objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. TOLAND was also understood to urge some objection.

Mr. WINTHROP rose to a point of order; and inquired whether it was in order to introduce a resolution instructing a committee on a subject pending in the House.

Mr. CLIFFORD replied that this was a separate bill altogether, and essentially different from any other before the House.

The SPEAKER overruled all the objections which had been raised.

Mr. CLIFFORD moved the previous question on his resolution.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CLIFFORD called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, resulted as follows: yeas 81, nays 110:

H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Sweney, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Tillinghast, Trotti, Turney, Underwood, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Wise, and Wood—110.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question then recurred on seconding the previous question.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for tellers, and Messrs. C. JOHNSON and JAMES were appointed; and, having taken the vote, they reported 91 in the affirmative, and 79 in the negative.

So the motion for the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. BARNARD called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 115, nays 88, as follows:

So the House ordered the main question to be now put.

The question was then taken on the resolution of Mr. CLIFFORD; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 78, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Black, Boardman, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Bronson, Aaron V. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—78.

Mr. BARNARD rose for the purpose of asking some directions from the Speaker, or the House, in regard to his duty in this matter. He understood the House as having passed an order that the Committee on the Judiciary should bring in a bill forthwith to repeal the bankrupt law; but there was a standing rule of the House conflicting with this order, which provided that no committee should hold its meetings while the House was in session. He wished to know how he was to act, so as to avoid a breach of one or the other of these rules.

Mr. WISE said that, in order to relieve the gentleman from New York of the difficulty he had suggested, he would move that the Committee on the Judiciary have leave to sit during the sittings of the House, till they had performed the duty assigned them.

Mr. BARNARD. Is that motion in order, Mr. Speaker? If it is not, I shall object to it.

The SPEAKER said that the motion was not in order; and

Mr. WISE appealed from that decision. He would appeal to the House if, after the vote just given, it was not the duty of the Committee on the Judiciary to report the bill "forthwith."

Mr. CLIFFORD called for the yeas and nays on the appeal; which were ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON of Indiana moved to lay the appeal on the table; and

Mr. CLIFFORD called for the yeas and nays on that question; which were also ordered.

Mr. BARNARD begged leave to inquire of the Chair if the rule in regard to the meetings of the committees during the sessions of the House did not require a vote of two-thirds to be set aside.

The SPEAKER answered that it did; and not only that, but this being resolution day, without debate, under the rules, it would require two-thirds to suspend that rule also.

The question was then taken on laying the appeal on the table, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 91.

The SPEAKER continued the call for resolutions from the State of Maine.

Mr. LOWELL offered a resolution to authorize the Committee on the Judiciary to sit during the session of the House, for the purpose of taking the necessary steps to comply with the resolution of the House directing them to report a bill "forthwith" for the repeal of the bankrupt law. He also moved the previous question.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON moved to lay the resolution on the table. [Loud cries of "The yeas and nays."]

Mr. FILLMORE hoped the gentleman from Maine would withdraw his resolution, as the whole subject would certainly require some discussion.

Mr. LOWELL did not comply, and the yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 97, nays 105.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN inquired whether, if the demand for the previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered to be put, it would not require a vote of two-thirds to adopt the resolution, as it would operate to suspend the rule of the House.

The SPEAKER replied that the resolution only provided that the committee have leave to sit.

Mr. READ said the 23d rule directed that on this day resolutions should be introduced; but it also directed that, when a resolution was introduced which any gentleman wished to debate, such resolution should lie over until another day, and not interrupt the presentation of resolutions which no gentleman desired to debate. Now, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had expressed his desire to debate this question; and he (Mr. R.) submitted whether, such a declaration having been made, the resolution must not necessarily go over; and whether it was in order for the gentleman from Maine to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER replied that the gentleman from Maine moved the previous question before the gentleman from New York expressed his wish to debate the resolution, or before he [Mr. FILLMORE] was even entitled to the floor.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN raised an objection, on the ground that the gentleman from Maine had moved the previous question before his resolution was read by the Clerk, or had even reached the Chair.

Some conversation ensued on this point, which, however, the Speaker overruled.

Mr. BARNARD called for tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question; but he subsequently withdrew it, and it was renewed by Mr. YORKE.

Messrs. READ and POPE were appointed tellers, and they reported 81 in the affirmative, and 79 in the negative; so there was a second.

The main question was then ordered to be now put, and the resolution was adopted by a vote of ayes 112, nays 81, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Black, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. REMOVAL OF JONATHAN ROBERTS.

Mr. FESSENDEN offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House whether any charges have, at any time, been preferred to the department against Jonathan Roberts, late collector of the port of Philadelphia, relative to his discharge of the duties of said office; and if any have been, that he be directed to furnish copies of the same. Also, that he transmit to the House copies of any order, instructions, or request, addressed to said Jonathan Roberts, to remove or appoint any subordinate officer of the customs at the port of Philadelphia. Also, a copy of the order or letter dismissing him from the office of collector of said port, and copies of all letters and papers in possession of the department relating to the subjects embraced by this resolution.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected to the reception of the resolution as out of order. According to the rule, he contended it must lie over.

The SPEAKER sustained the objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN contended that he had moved the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER said that, inasmuch as the resolution was one which called on the department for information, it must lie over.

Mr. TOLAND then moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of considering it at this time.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL asked for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered.

The House refused to suspend the rules—yeas 103, nays 76, (not two thirds,) as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Black, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Bronson, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. NAYS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Cushing, Daniel, R. D. Davis, Dean, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, William O. So the resolution lies over.

RESOLUTIONS OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. BURKE presented the resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire in relation to the tariff, the bankrupt law, &c.; which he moved be laid on the table and printed.

After objection to the printing, made (but subsequently withdrawn) by Mr. BOTTS, the motion was carried.

Mr. HUDSON offered a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill to refund to the State of Massachusetts a certain balance of the sum expended by her for the services of her militia during the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. HOPKINS asked if the resolution should not be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which had heretofore had this subject under consideration.

Mr. HUDSON suggested a modification of his resolution, so as to include the claims of the State of Maine.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland asked the gentleman to again modify his resolution, so as to include the claims of the State of Maryland; which was agreed to, and

The resolution as modified was adopted.

Mr. TILLINGHAST offered a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary, which had just been directed by a resolution of the House to report a bill to repeal the bankrupt act, also to report a proviso to said bill, that this repeal shall not extend to any case which, at the time the act goes into effect, shall be pending, or to any proceedings which have been legally commenced under the said bankrupt act.

Mr. CLIFFORD moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. TILLINGHAST called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, on taking the question, resulted in yeas 60, nays 112.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TILLINGHAST and other gentlemen called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ARNOLD withdrew the motion.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question; and there was a second. The main question was also ordered to be put, and the resolution was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 17, 1843.

Mr. EVANS presented a petition from Nancy Polereesky, widow of John Polereesky, late an officer in the army of the Revolution, praying a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WOODBURY presented the credentials of the Hon. CHARLES G. ATHERTON, who was elected by the Legislature of New Hampshire a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March next; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files.

Mr. CRAFTS presented joint resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Vermont, asking the reimbursement, by Congress, of the expenditures incurred in defending the frontier towns during the late border difficulties with Canada: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RIVES presented a memorial from certain citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, asking early action by Congress on the subject of the currency, and recommending the adoption of the plan for a board of exchequer recommended by the Executive: ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a petition from Mary Krug, the widow of Philip Krug, a revolutionary soldier, praying the renewal of the act of July, 1838, granting half-pay pensions to widows of revolutionary officers and soldiers: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DESTRUCTION OF STEAMBOATS ON THE OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RIVERS.

Mr. LINN stated that he had been requested to present to the Senate a memorial from the city of St. Louis, in Missouri, signed by nearly fifteen hundred of its most intelligent and useful business men. He knew many of the gentlemen who had put their names to this memorial; and he could assure the Senate that the utmost confidence was due to any statements they endorsed. The prayer of the memorial is, that Congress may make an appropriation for improving the navigation of the great Western rivers. The memorialists state that, especially in the Missouri and Mississippi rivers, within the last four years, the accumulation of snags has been so great as to render navigation not only dangerous in the extreme to commerce, but hazardous, in consequence of the great number of lives lost by passengers. They farther state, that, in the year 1839, there were forty steamboats lost; in 1840, there were forty-one; twenty-nine in 1841; and in 1842, twenty eight. These boats would average $25,000 each—making a total loss of $3,000,000. But this is not all: they further state, that almost every boat engaged in the Missouri trade has been injured, more or less, by snags, the repairs of which cost about $260; which makes a total loss to the community of $3,710,000 in the course of four years. They also say, that about 450 steamboats are employed in the trade of the Western rivers; eighty-one partly or entirely owned in St. Louis in 1841; and about 200 participate more or less in what is called the St. Louis trade. About one hundred boats, they say, are regularly employed in the trade of their city—of which number, twenty-three were lost in 1841, and nearly as many have been lost in the past year.

Between the 11th of September and the 13th of October in the past year, (less than five weeks,) the following steamboats were lost between the city of St. Louis and the mouth of the Ohio:

Sept. 11.—Mentor, at Goose island—boat lost, and part of the cargo: loss	$34,000
Sept. 13.—New Orleans, sunk within a hundred yards of the wreck of the Mentor: loss	45,000
Sept 22.—Pre-emption, sunk within a quarter of a mile of the Mentor—boat total loss: loss, including part of the cargo	25,000
Same day.—Robert T. Lytle, sunk in sight of the same place—the boat since raised: loss, in cargo, &c.	7,000
Sept. 26.—Fort Pitt, sunk within half a mile of the wreck of the Mentor: boat lost; cargo partly saved	25,000
Oct. 6.—Hull of steamboat Louisville, sunk five miles above Cairo: loss	8,000
Oct. 7.—Osage Valley, struck the hull of the Louisville, and sunk—boat total loss; cargo partly saved: loss	40,000
Oct. 13.—Eliza, bound to New Orleans, with full cargo and a large number of passengers, struck a snag six miles above Cairo; tore the bottom out; sunk to the hurricane deck in two minutes, and between forty and fifty persons were drowned: loss of boat and cargo	50,000

These losses, amounting to $234,000, occurred in less than five weeks, between St. Louis and the mouth of the Ohio.

Among other boats sunk last year, they name the John Perry, Queen of the West, North Alabama, Vicksburg, Pratte Barge, Nonpareil, Lebanon, Corvette, Amaranth, Neptune, &c.; all valuable boats, and richly laden.

They further say, that the most formidable obstructions in the Western rivers are at St. Louis, or near that place; but they, nevertheless, sympathize with their fellow-citizens throughout the great valley of the Mississippi, and feel called on to cooperate with these in urging this honorable body to do justice to the West, by making ample appropriations for the immediate improvement of our rivers—the Missouri, the Ohio, and Upper and Lower Mississippi. They observe that they can safely say that the commerce on those rivers and their tributaries, forming twenty thousand miles of interior navigation, cannot amount to less, at the present time, than two hundred millions per year. The removal of snags, the clearing of logs from the banks caved in, and the improvement of the harbor of St. Louis, (all commenced several years ago,) cannot be completed unless by the aid of the Government, and under its authority. They say that the rapids of the Upper Mississippi could be improved by a slack-water navigation, or a canal, which would enhance the value of the public lands.

This subject was taken up by the population of the whole valley of the Mississippi. Every man, woman, and child, in that valley, was directly interested in the improvement of the great Western rivers. This population must and will be heard on this important matter. He could not face his constituents without doing all in his power to obviate the crying and melancholy evils complained of. He could not return home unless he exerted himself, with all the ability and energy he possessed, to procure this appropriation.

Nearly four millions of dollars worth of property had been destroyed in less than four years—a greater loss, he presumed, than had accrued from storm or tempest on our Atlantic coast. This can be obviated by Congress on the Western waters, whilst God alone can command the storms of the great deep. The greatest amount of loss will be found between St. Louis and the mouth of the Ohio—a distance of two hundred miles. A snag-boat at work at a few points designated emphatically "steamboat graveyards," would have prevented all the destruction of property and loss of lives complained of in this and other petitions. Captain Shreeve eradicated one year all the snags that formerly obstructed these points; by which navigation was rendered comparatively safe. This can be done again. It was vainly hoped that iron steamboats would have resisted the snags and sawyers which stand in some places like a forest of enormous trees. This has been tested, and found wanting. The Valley Forge iron boat was lost this winter; but she had, he understood, been since raised. Scarcely a Western newspaper can be taken up, in which some account of a fresh wreck is not found. Last night, he observed in one the loss of the Henry Clay, valued at $40,000, without estimating the cargo. Two hundred millions of dollars are involved in the trade carried on by steamboats on these rivers—thirty millions belonging to St. Louis.

He said he held in his hand a pamphlet, printed by the Chamber of Commerce of St. Louis, and drawn up with care, ability, and truth, which he thought would throw some light on the subject; and he would ask that it might be referred to the Committee on Commerce, with the memorial.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he fully and heartily concurred with the memorialists, as well as in the very just remarks of his friend from Missouri. The subject was of great importance to the whole country, but of special consequence to the Great West. He had long thought that this important matter had been too much neglected by Congress. Such had been the loss of property and sacrifice of human life, in consequence of the neglect of the Government to remove the obstructions from the Western waters, and to provide safe harbors on the Western lakes, that there was, and would be, but one voice on the subject; and he trusted and hoped that the time had arrived for effective action on the subject. He might not live, however, politically, to see the work accomplished, as his term in the Senate was about to expire; but he trusted that Western members would press the matter upon the attention of Congress, until the navigation of Western waters shall be rendered cheap and safe to the great and increasing commerce of the West. He would not go into the details of the memorials referred to by the Senator from Missouri. The facts, however, are most startling; and he recommended their attentive examination to the committee to whom they were referred.

Mr. HUNTINGTON did not rise for the purpose of entering into discussion, but to assure the Senators that the subject had not escaped the attention of the Committee on Commerce. Several memorials were before the committee; and all he deemed necessary to say at present was, that the most anxious desire to do justice in the matter pervaded the committee.

Mr. ALLEN expressed his satisfaction at the assurance just given by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that the subject would be carefully considered. He rose to move the printing of this memorial, that it might go, with others on the subject, to that committee, in the same manner and form. He hoped the committee would embody all the facts, information, and reasoning of the several memorials, in one general report, showing the extent, importance, and value of the navigation of the Western waters, and the loss of lives and property occasioned by the obstructions, for the removal of which the appropriation is asked.

Mr. WILLIAMS conceived that these memorials, instead of going to the Committee on Printing, on the question of printing, ought to go to the Committee on Commerce, which could select such portions of them as might be considered most important for printing.

Mr. BARROW stated that it was the design of the Committee on Commerce to investigate all the papers on the subject referred to it, and to combine the information and facts they furnished into a general report. Every member of the committee, as far as he could observe, was well disposed towards the object in view, and all were aware of the importance of the navigation of these Western rivers, and of the necessity for doing something to arrest the losses complained of.

The committee had imposed on him the task of collating the materials and making up the report, which he was at present engaged upon, and hoped would be ready for consideration in a few days. When the report is completed, it will be found that the printing of this memorial, or of that from Cincinnati, separately, will be unnecessary; as all that they contain will be introduced in the report itself.

Mr. CALHOUN said, in the absence of a representation of the State of Tennessee in this body, he thought it proper to call the attention of the committee to one of the main branches of the Mississippi river, which had apparently been entirely overlooked: he alluded to the Tennessee river. That river was, he believed, of more importance than any other of the branches of the Mississippi, with the exception of the Ohio. There were no less than six States interested in the navigation of that river. It was a larger stream than the Ohio, and, if the same expense were bestowed upon it, as upon the Ohio river, he would not be at all surprised to see, in the course of ten years, the commerce upon that river exceed that of the Ohio. He hoped that the interests of Tennessee would not be allowed to suffer, in consequence of having no representation here; but that the committee would inquire how far this great river was entitled to their attention; and that they would establish some principle upon which the navigation of these great internal seas—for such, to all intents, they were—might be improved; and to see how far this great river was entitled to their attention, on the principle thus established.

He believed the time was not far distant when a large proportion of the commerce of the Mississippi would pass through this channel. There was already in process of construction a railroad connecting the city of Savannah with the Tennessee river—a very considerable portion of which was now nearly completed, being graded, and ready to receive the iron. It would require but small expense to open a continuous road from Charleston, on the one side, to the Tennessee river on the other; which would afford, at all seasons of the year, a more speedy communication than any line upon the Atlantic coast.

Mr. BENTON rose to invite the attention of the committee to the appropriation of $100,000, made at the last session of Congress, for removing obstructions in the Mississippi river, and other great Western rivers. He read the appropriation, in these words:

"For building and repairing the necessary boats, and for carrying on the improvements on the Missouri, Mississippi, Ohio, and Arkansas rivers, one hundred thousand dollars, under the direction of the Secretary of War; and for the preservation and repairs of public works heretofore constructed for the improvement of harbors, thirty thousand dollars."

The appropriation for the rivers (Mr. B. said) was made on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky farthest on the other side, [Mr. CRITTENDEN;] and he would wish the committee to ascertain how far it had been applied.

He (Mr. B.) had been on the Mississippi and Missouri since the appropriation. That was made in August, and he had been on the river in October and November; at which time he saw no employment of these snag-boats. The destruction of the commercial boats was the greatest that ever was known. He had passed one (the Eliza) immediately after its loss—the top was visible above the water—and where forty lives, to say nothing of property, were supposed to be lost. It was agonizing to behold the survivors wandering among the trees on the shore, consumed by grief, and lingering at the spot where the dearest of objects had gone to the bottom. He saw this soon after it happened. It was one of numerous instances; and not only further appropriations were needed, but it was well to know how far the one of the last session had been applied.

Mr. WALKER called the attention of the committee to a navigable tributary of the Mississippi river, flowing 600 miles through a country that furnished a larger contribution of cotton to the commerce of the South, than either the Tennessee, the Red river, or the Arkansas. He alluded to the Yazoo river. If the attention of the committee was to be directed to the improvements of the rivers just mentioned, he should require an extension of the appropriation for that purpose to the necessary improvements of the Yazoo. Mr. W. entered into a variety of details, showing the importance and value of the navigation of the Yazoo river and its connecting rivers and passes.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said he regretted that anything like disputation should occur at this early stage of the business, as to the extent of the improvements to be made, and as to the rivers to be improved. He hoped that something would be done in relation to the great rivers of the West—the Mississippi and the Ohio, and perhaps some others; but if they were going to include all the inferior streams, it was perfectly evident, as had been well said by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] they would not be able to legislate upon the subject at all. The Mississippi and the Ohio rivers were to those States whose boundary they formed, what the ocean was to our Atlantic brethren; and it would be found, upon examination, that there was a greater amount of commerce upon those rivers than upon the whole Atlantic coast. These rivers were our great inland ocean, and we had as much right to claim the assistance of this Government as those living upon the Atlantic coast had. He did not desire to see public attention drawn off from those rivers which were important in themselves, to those of comparatively less importance. He hoped the committee which had charge of the subject would confine themselves to the great object of the improvement of these large rivers. This would be sufficient to engage their attention for the present; and—as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. KING] had well said—hereafter, when their means would enable them to do so, it would be proper to turn their attention to the smaller rivers. Upon the same principle upon which the attention of Congress was demanded to the Yazoo, a hundred other streams would claim attention. There were in the State of Kentucky two or three rivers: there was Green river, Kentucky river, and Licking river——all these to be improved by the State itself, at an expense of millions of dollars. He hoped the committee, for the purpose of rendering effectual anything which they might do upon this subject, would confine their attention to those rivers which partake of the character of national.

[Mr. BUCHANAN. And Salt river.]

Mr. WALKER thought this a question of as great importance as could come before the Committee on Commerce. The navigation of these great inland channels of communication with the ocean, furnished more produce for exportation than the Atlantic coast, on which so many millions had been expended for the alleged benefit of commerce. He pointed out the vast sums expended for the mere survey of that coast, and contrasted the amount of expenditure yet required to complete it, and for which appropriations were continually solicited from Congress, with the amount required for improving the Western waters, which it seemed so difficult to obtain. He did not wish it to be understood, that if no appropriation was made for the Yazoo river, he would oppose the appropriation for the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; but what he meant to say was, that if the Tennessee and other rivers are introduced into the measure, he would insist on the superior claims of the Yazoo.

Mr. BENTON said the application now made from St. Louis was for the application of the peculiar remedy invented for the rivers with falling-in banks; and it would be injurious to the object to complicate it with a general inquiry into the propriety of improving all the Western rivers. These rivers were of different characters, and required different modes of improvement. Those with falling-in banks and soft bottoms were obstructed chiefly by logs and trees. Those with permanent banks were obstructed chiefly by rocks and hard bars. For each, a different treatment was required. The snag-boat had been invented twelve or fifteen years ago, for the removal of logs and trees; and the application now was to continue to employ them. The Mississippi, the Missouri, the Red river, and the Arkansas, were the principal rivers which required them. The Ohio required them in a less degree, as there were but few sunken logs or trees in it. Its banks were permanent, and presented no examples of the acres of land falling in at once, with all their vast trees upon it, which were seen upon the rivers with falling-in banks.

He (Mr. B.) was very willing that the Tennessee, and other rivers should receive the improvement suitable to them; but it would be wrong to clog the present application with an inquiry in relation to them. Rocks and hard bars did not require snag-boats; and the whole application now was for the snag-boats. He (Mr. B.) was willing they should be used wherever necessary, and wherever they could go. They were obliged to be large, to have the power necessary to drag these immense trees from their beds in the rivers: they could not go into small rivers; but he was willing they should go where they could. But they should first go to the great theatre of the destruction of life and property—and that was the Mississippi.

Mr. SEVIER pointed out that the appropriation now sought for was to remove snags in the rivers where they formed such dangerous impediments to navigation. The other rivers to which gentlemen alluded were not impeded by snags or sawyers; the improvements they might require were altogether of a different character.

Mr. CALHOUN said, in reference to the improvement of the Tennessee river, he had, at the last session of Congress, been charged with a memorial, very numerously signed, praying that that important river might be put upon exactly the same footing as the other great branches of the Mississippi. The memorial was referred to a committee, but he believed no action had been taken upon it. He would not, perhaps, have thought it necessary to take so lively an interest in the subject, had he not been particularly solicited by the memorialists to bring the matter under the notice of the Senate. What he desired, therefore, at present, was, that whatever principle should be applied to the other important branches of the Mississippi, should be applied to this also. He claimed, on behalf of the memorialists, that the committee should adopt some broad principle which should be applicable to all the important branches of the Mississippi, and not confined to one or two only.

Mr. BARROW said he would add one additional remark to what he had said when first up. He certainly did not desire to protract this desultory conversational debate, because he thought it was altogether mistimed; but he thought it his duty, in order that Senators might not suppose that he had omitted to take notice of their suggestions, or that he had any disposition to overlook this important stream to which they had called the attention of the committee of the Senate, to make this single remark: that the Committee on Commerce had before it memorials from the West, and from the East, asking Congress for an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers; and, by some of them, the Missouri was also included. These memorials had been handed over by the committee to him, [Mr. BARROW,] for examination, and in order that he might make a report upon them.

He believed the committee were bound to report upon the subject as it had been submitted, and that they had no right to enter into an inquiry whether an appropriation ought to be made at this session for the improvement of the Tennessee and the Yazoo, or any other than those which had been specially submitted to their consideration by the memorialists. He would ask, was it a reasonable expectation that the committee should go into the broad subject of improvement, unless specially instructed so to do? He would not have troubled the Senate with this additional remark, had he not apprehended that the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Mississippi might suppose that the committee had overlooked important matters to which their attention had been called.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from a large number of persons, of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, praying for the immediate erection of a floating dock at the naval station at Brooklyn, on the plan of J. S. Gilbert: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, presented two memorials from the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, presented two memorials from the cities of New York and Brooklyn, in favor of the adoption of the plan for a board of exchequer recommended by the President: ordered to lie on the table.

Also, presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Apalachicola, Florida, asking an appropriation for establishing light-houses on Cape St. George and Cape San Blas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Mr. T. said that this memorial had been on his table for some time, but, in consequence of indisposition, he was unable to present it to the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial of a convention of delegates of the citizens of East Tennessee, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the Tennessee river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from Captain John Moore, praying the payment of his accounts as commissary of subsistence of certain Missouri militia; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, presented two memorials from the city of New York, signed by a number of persons, in which they say that it is their belief that the (so called) bankrupt law is unconstitutional and destructive of the rights of the creditor, and pray for its repeal: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, presented a memorial from a number of inhabitants of Platte county, Missouri, who were residents on a military reservation, complaining of the destruction of their property by a United States officer, in consequence of not obeying his order of removal from said reservation; and asking a settlement of their claims for the loss of this property, and for the loss of their land, which was covered by the reservation alluded to: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BENTON remarked that he had intended, on yesterday, to call the attention of the Senate to what he conceived to be another error in the printed speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] on the British treaty, in secret session; but the Senator was not then in his seat. It was his intention to do so to-day; but, as the morning hour had expired, he would not trespass on the time of the Senate, but would postpone doing so till to-morrow morning.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the augmentation of the marine corps; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. B. remarked that he had been directed, by the same committee, to report a bill which was connected with the great subject under discussion this morning—the improvement of harbors and rivers, to give facility to commerce. It was a bill for the survey and examination of the harbor of Memphis, Tennessee, with a view of establishing a navy-yard and naval depot at that place. He had been directed to report that bill back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. ARCHER presented a memorial from the heirs of Daniel Truehart, praying indemnity for property destroyed during the revolutionary war: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the resolutions adopted by the Senate, instructing that committee to inquire into the expediency of retaining the organization of the four companies of light artillery, and of repealing so much of the act of last session respecting the reorganization of the army, which provided that the second regiment of dragoons should be converted into a rifle regiment, reported a bill to repeal certain portions of the act entitled "An act respecting the organization of the army, and for other purposes," approved the 23d August, 1842; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the bill for the relief of Dr. Boyd Reilly.

Mr. CONRAD presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New Orleans, praying for the establishment of the warehousing system; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of the Board of Directors of the Petersburg Railroad Company, praying for an extension of the time for admitting railroad iron free of duty, reported a bill for the benefit of the Petersburg Railroad Company; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. EVANS, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the appointment of an assistant collector for the port of Bangor, in the collection district of Belfast, Maine; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, on the conditions therein expressed," approved June 15, 1836, made a report favorable to its passage; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, without amendment, House bill (212) entitled "An act authorizing sales of land, with the improvements thereon erected by the United States, for the use of their agents, teachers, farmers, mechanics, and other persons employed amongst the Indians."

Also reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Joseph Bryan, Harrison Young, and Benjamin Young.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, House bill (462) for the relief of John Hicks; and House bill (289) for the relief of John Javins.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK,

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to communicate to the Senate a statement showing the number of existing contracts with railroad companies for the transportation of the mail, and the price established to be paid for said service, under each contract; and also the amount paid for the transportation of the mail over each of said routes the year previous to the contract with the respective railroad companies.

The following engrossed bills were then read the third time and passed, viz:

The bill authorizing a settlement of the accounts of Joseph Nourse.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Dyson;" and

The bill entitled "An act to revive the act for the relief of Mary Tucker."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, a statement of the imports and exports of gold and silver coin and bullion since 1834; which, on motion of Mr. BENTON, was ordered to be printed. Then,

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 17, 1843.

Mr. A. C. DODGE, of Iowa, presented a memorial from citizens of the city of Burlington, Iowa, representing that the commerce and business of said city, together with that of the flourishing and thrifty towns of Bloomington, Davenport, Rock Island, Galena, Dubuque, and Prairie du Chien, and the country around them on either side of the river, embracing the finest portions of the State of Illinois and the Territories of Iowa and Wisconsin, is subjected to a most burdensome tax in the increased price of freights, occasioned by the obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi river at the Des Moines, or Lower Rapids, and earnestly urging on Congress the great importance of making an appropriation to remove said obstructions: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a petition for a donation of land to the Mechanics' Mutual Aid Association of Iowa city, for literary and scientific purposes: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition from citizens of the mineral district in Iowa, praying a speedy sale of the mineral lands: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. READ of Pennsylvania presented two petitions, signed by sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt bill: referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GREEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill appropriating $200,000 per year, commencing the present year, and to be continued for the ensuing ten years, to be applied to the removal of the obstructions in the Western waters, and be under the control of the Secretary of War; and report to this House with the most convenient despatch.

Mr. FILLMORE said that he was about to report a bill on the subject contained in the resolution.

Mr. GREEN proposed that the House should adopt his resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution adopted.

Mr. H. DODGE introduced "A bill for the protection of commerce on the western shores of Lake Michigan."

Twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EVERETT moved the printing of the substitute for the exchequer plan now in Committee of the Whole.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. PENDLETON desired to present a memorial in relation to the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.

Objection having been made, Mr. P. moved a suspension of the rules; but the House refused to suspend.

The committees were then called on for reports.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers, and for continuing the Cumberland road, for the half calendar year ending June 30, 1843, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1844.

The bill was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PICKENS, from the same committee, reported a bill to extend the time for laying down iron actually imported for railroad companies. Mr. P. suggested that it would not be necessary to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole. He therefore moved that the bill be printed, and that it lie on the Speaker's table: agreed to.

CLERK IN THE SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a joint resolution for the continuation of an additional clerk in the Second Auditor's Office; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COWEN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert A. Kelly: twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the same committee, made sundry adverse reports.

PROPOSED MEETING AT TEN O'CLOCK.

Mr. COWEN reported a resolution that the House shall meet, on Friday and Saturday next, at 10 o'clock, for the transaction of private business.

Mr. C. moved the previous question on the adoption of the resolution; but the House refused to second it.

Mr. TURNEY moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COWEN asked for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The House refused to order them.

The motion to lay on the table was then adopted without a division.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY presented a petition from Baltimore against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which, he said, was numerously signed by men of both parties.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of W. S. Esleth: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. CARY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill granting the right of pre-emption to certain settlers in Wisconsin: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Also, a bill granting to the Territory of Wisconsin a certain tract of land, for the benefit of the town of Fairplay, in said Territory: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported Senate bill 39, (proposing certain amendments to the bill for the establishment of additional mail routes, passed August, 1842,) with the unanimous recommendation that it be rejected. The bill and report of the committee were ordered to lie on the table.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following bill:

A BILL to repeal the bankrupt law.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved on the 19th day of August, 1841, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Provided, however, That the repeal shall not extend to or affect any case which, at the time this act goes into effect, shall be pending before any court; nor to any proceeding which, at said time, shall have been legally commenced, and which shall be then in progress, under and by virtue of the said act hereby repealed.

The bill was read a first time.

Mr. BARNARD objected to its second reading, which he said he could do under the rule, which forbade the second reading of a bill on the same day it was reported, unless no objection was made.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that the second reading of the bill having been objected to, the question would come up before the House, Shall this bill be rejected?

Mr. BARNARD repeated his objection, and insisted on his right to make it.

Mr. CLIFFORD remarked that the parliamentary law was imperative in requiring the question to be taken on the rejection of the bill, after the objection made to its second reading by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD.]

The SPEAKER said that, by reference to the 109th rule of the House, he found that, if objection was made to the first reading of the bill, the question would then ensue upon its rejection. By that rule, no bill could have its first and second reading on the same day, without a special order from the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON. Let us make it the special order now.

Mr. BARNARD said he claimed the floor to make another report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MOORE suggested that the second reading of the bill be fixed for to-morrow.

Mr. BARNARD persisted in his point of order, and his right to the floor.

Mr. ATHERTON observed, that the bill had been read the first time; and it was not necessary for it to be read a second time, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] should make the motion. He (Mr. A) would now make the motion that the bill be read the second time.

Mr. BARNARD said that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] was not entitled to the floor to make the motion.

Mr. ATHERTON said that the bill was not disposed of; it was under consideration; and, the gentleman having reported it, and refused to move its second reading, or its reference, he had no right to the floor for any other purpose.

Mr. BARNARD insisted upon it that the bill was not before the House. He had the floor, and no person had a right to make the motion but himself.

Mr. BRIGGS understood that the gentleman claimed the floor for another subject.

Mr. ROOSEVELT asked if it was not now in order to move to amend the bill?

After some further conversation—

The SPEAKER said that he was clearly of opinion that the House had the right to order the bill to be read a second time now.

Mr. BARNARD then observed that, after that decision of the Chair, he should no longer object to the second reading.

The bill was then read the second time; when

Mr. TURNEY rose, and said that he wished to offer an amendment to the bill; but,

Mr. BARNARD rising, the Speaker awarded the floor to that gentleman.

Mr. B. then, under instructions from the Committee on the Judiciary, moved to recommit the bill to that committee, with instructions to report amendments to the following effect:

"1st. Confining the repeal to that part of the bankrupt law which authorizes proceedings in bankruptcy on the sole petition and motion of the bankrupt.

"2d. Authorizing any bankrupt to declare himself insolvent, and making such declaration an act of bankruptcy upon which his creditors may proceed against him in bankruptcy.

"3d. Authorizing the creditors, or a majority of them in amount, to nominate the assignee of the bankrupt's estate.

"4th. Providing that the assent of a majority in amount of the creditors shall be necessary to a discharge."

Mr. TURNEY rose to a question of order. The Speaker, he understood, gave the floor to the gentleman from New York, as a matter of courtesy to the reporter of a bill. Now, he contended that he, having risen and claimed the floor before the gentleman, was entitled to it. The gentleman from New York, he added, had forfeited his right by courtesy, because, after reporting the bill, he had objected to its second reading, and refused to make a motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole, in accordance with the universal practice.

The CHAIR said that the member from New York was entitled to the preference given him, according to the universal practice of the House. No member had ever interposed between the reporter of a bill and any motion he might wish to make in regard to it.

Mr. TURNEY contended that the present case was entirely different from the usual practice of the House; for here the reporter of the bill objected to its second reading, and refused to make any motion to facilitate its progress.

The SPEAKER persisting in his decision,

Mr. TURNEY appealed, and addressed the House in favor of the appeal.

Mr. BARNARD was so unfortunate as to differ with the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to the facts of the case. According to his recollection, he addressed the Chair before the second reading of the bill; and after it was read the sec time, he again addressed the Chair first.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON desired to say that his colleague [Mr. TURNEY] was correct as to the facts stated by him. After the bill was read the second time, his colleague got up first, and addressed the Chair. This fact was within the recollection of several members. The Speaker, he understood, gave the floor to the gentleman from New York, on the ground of courtesy to the introducer of a bill; but it must be observed that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] got the floor between the introduction of the bill and its second reading, and that it was upon his motion that it was read the second time.

Mr. HOUSTON desired to ask the Chair whether it would now be in order to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER answered in the negative.

Mr. HOPKINS hoped the gentleman from Tennessee would withdraw the appeal. The Chair, in his opinion, had an arbitrary and unqualified right, under the parliamentary law, of awarding the floor to either of the members who may rise at the same time. Besides, the object that both he and the gentleman from Tennessee had in view, would not be promoted by persisting in the appeal. But for the appeal, a motion to amend would be in order, and a motion to commit also. He only asked the gentleman to withdraw his appeal, and he would make a motion to strike out the proviso.

The SPEAKER said that he would not go into an issue with the gentleman from Tennessee upon his statement of facts, because the Chair did not decide upon the facts he stated. The Chair decided upon the uniform practice and courtesy of the House to the reporter of a bill. The second reading occurred not upon the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, (who was not entitled to the floor to make it,) but as the necessary course of the bill upon the withdrawal of the objections of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD.] Had the gentleman persisted in his objections, the question would have been, not upon the second reading, but upon the rejection of the bill.

Mr. CLIFFORD asked if an amendment striking out the proviso of the bill would be in order, if the appeal were withdrawn.

The SPEAKER said that it would not.

Mr. CLIFFORD then addressed the House in favor of the appeal, contending that, upon the grounds stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. TURNEY,] the Speaker ought to have given him the floor, instead of the gentleman from New York. The object of the gentleman from New York, as was apparent to every one, was to defeat the bill. He therefore hoped that all who were in favor of the repeal would vote to reverse the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BRIGGS exclaimed against the appeal of the gentleman from Maine to the House, to vote against the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLIFFORD. Because it is wrong.

Mr. BRIGGS (without noticing the explanation) said, if the Speaker was right, it was the duty of the House to sustain him; but the course pointed out by the gentleman from Maine, who was himself a lawyer, would give a blow at parliamentary rule, with a vengeance; for it was an appeal to vote against the decision of the Chair, right or wrong. He made some further remarks which were not distinctly heard.

Mr. WISE said there was no principle involved, except as to who was entitled to the floor; and he added that he believed the Speaker had absolute power on that point.

The SPEAKER then put the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" which was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. WISE then asked what would be the effect of the previous question.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that it would bring the House to a vote on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. WISE inquired whether it would cut off the proviso.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

Mr. WISE. Then I move the previous question. I am in favor of the proviso. [Great excitement.]

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, if this motion ——

Mr. WISE (amidst much confusion) Mr. Speaker, is this in order?

The SPEAKER replied, but his voice was overpowered by the hum of excited conversation throughout the hall.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I cannot hear a word. [Great confusion.]

Mr. BARNARD. If this motion had been made in the ordinary way ——

Mr. WISE again interposed, and exclaimed that he could not hear a word that was said.

The SPEAKER called the House to order.

Mr. BARNARD then resumed, and said if this motion had been made in the ordinary way, on the commitment of the bill, and the previous question was sustained, he was aware it would bring the House directly to a vote on the main proposition; but the Speaker would remember that the motion was not made by him as an individual member of the House, but as the organ of the Judiciary Committee, and in the form and shape of a report from that committee; and in such a case, he submitted, the rule did not apply; and that if the previous question was seconded, the vote must first be taken on the report of the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER'S reply did not reach the reporter's desk.

Mr. BARNARD inquired whether the House could cut off the report of a committee.

The SPEAKER replied that it was for a majority of the House to determine.

Mr. WISE asked the Clerk to read the bill as it would stand if the previous question was seconded.

The Clerk read the bill, as submitted yesterday by Mr. CLIFFORD, simply repealing the bankrupt law, with the proviso submitted by Mr. TILLINGHAST.

Mr. WISE. I stick to the previous question.

The Speaker put the question on seconding the demand for the previous question, but he was unable to decide. Tellers were then demanded, and Messrs. WELLER and BRIGGS were appointed; and having taken the vote, they reported 92 in the affirmative, and 83 in the negative. There was, therefore, a second.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired? (It was 10 minutes past 1.)

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BARNARD. Then I call for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER. The order of the day is the further consideration of the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law. [Roars of laughter.]

[This bill, which was now the order of the day, was the bill some time since introduced by Mr. EVERETT, to which various amendments had been offered, and on which Mr. MARSHALL was entitled to the floor from the middle of last week.]

Mr. CUSHING rose and said Mr. KENNEDY'S bill to regulate the mode of measuring the tonnage of vessels had been made the special order for this day.

Mr. WISE inquired if the previous question had not been seconded on the bill which the Judiciary Committee, by direction of the House, had reported.

The SPEAKER said it had, and it would be the order of the day for the morning hour to morrow.

Mr. WISE. [Laughing.] Well, "take your time, Miss Lucy." [Laughter.]

Some conversation ensued respecting the bill which Mr. CUSHING contended was the special order for this day; but

The SPEAKER announced the order of the day to be Mr. EVERETT'S bill to repeal the bankrupt law, on which the gentleman from Kentucky was entitled to the floor.

And the state of the question was this:

Mr. BARNARD had moved the following amendment to (or substitute for) the original bill:

"That so much of the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved on the 19th of August, 1841, as authorizes any person owing debts to apply by petition, for the benefit of said act, together with all the parts of said act which are applicable solely to the mode of obtaining the benefit of the provisions of such act, in behalf of debtors, by the voluntary petition of such debtors, without the concurrence or aid of their creditors be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy already commenced, or which shall be commenced before the 4th day of July next, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures, prescribed and incurred, or which shall be incurred, under said act."

And Mr. CUSHING had offered the following amendment to the original bill:

"In the proviso of the original bill, strike out the '5th day of December, 1842,' &c., and insert so that the proviso shall read as follows. 'Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures incurred under the said act; but every such proceeding may be continued to its final consummation, in like manner as if this act had not been passed."

Mr. BRIGGS had moved that the bill be committed to the Committee on on the Judiciary, with the following instructions:

"To report a bill to repeal that part of the existing law which authorises the voluntary application of debtors, and to include corporations which issue paper to circulate as money within the operations of said law."

Which proposed instructions Mr. C. JOHNSON had moved to amend, so as to instruct the committee to report a bill for the immediate repeal of the bankrupt law, without limit or qualifications; (simply, in fact, striking out the proviso of the original bill of Mr. EVERETT.]

Mr. MARSHALL rose and said he would not be responsible for any delay of the action of this House on the subject of the bankrupt law; but he wished to inquire what would be the effect on himself, if he moved the previous question, and it should not be sustained by the House—whether he should retain the right to the floor. He did not wish to take the responsibility of any delay in the action of the House; but he did not wish to forfeit his right to the floor, if the House should refuse to second his motion.

The SPEAKER replied that, if the previous question was voted down, the gentleman from Kentucky would not be absolutely entitled to the floor, though, no doubt, he would obtain it by courtesy.

Mr. MARSHALL said, then, for the second or third time, he put himself on the courtesy of the House, and he moved the previous question.

Mr. GRANGER said, if the previous question was not sustained, he should certainly object to the gentleman from Kentucky having the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. But if I get it, the gentleman from New York cannot prevent my speaking.

Mr. GRANGER said, warmly, the gentleman from Kentucky had spoken once.

Mr. MARSHALL contradicted the assertion of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER also said that the gentleman from Kentucky had not spoken on this question.

Mr. MARSHALL again moved the previous question.

Mr. CUSHING protested against the motion for the previous question. He said several gentlemen had entered into a very general debate, which had been continued for several days while this bill was before the House, and he protested against being thus cut off from a reply. If, however, he could get the floor, if the House should negative the previous question, he should claim and retain it, courtesy or no courtesy.

Mr. MARSHALL said there was not a gentleman on that floor more anxious to discuss the question than he was.

(Cries of "Go on, then.")

Mr. WISE inquired, if the previous question was sustained, and the main question was ordered to be put, and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] should be adopted, whether the bill would not then be, in substance, the same as the bill to be acted upon to-morrow morning?

Mr. CUSHING. Precisely.

Some conversation ensued as to the priority of the amendments; and

Tellers were demanded on seconding the motion for the previous question. Messrs. BRIGGS and READ were appointed; and they reported 110 in the affirmative, and 28 in the negative; there was, therefore, a second.

The effect of sustaining the previous question was to cut off the several motions to commit with instructions, and to bring the House to a vote upon the amendments to the bill.

The question recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING]

Mr. SMITH of Virginia called for its reading; and it was read.

Mr. S. expressed a desire to move an amendment to the amendment; but the motion was ruled out of order.

The amendment was then adopted—yeas 148, nays 62, as follows:

The SPEAKER announced the question to be upon the engrossment of the bill; and it was ordered to be engrossed.

The CHAIR. When shall the bill have its third reading?

Many members. "Now."

Mr. ARNOLD rose and objected, upon the ground that the bill was not yet engrossed.

The SPEAKER said that the bill must go over until to morrow, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the bill be read again to-day.

The SPEAKER said that the bill not being engrossed, that could not be done but by general consent.

Mr. HOPKINS said that it could be done by order of the House.

Mr. EVERETT moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. WISE inquired what would be the effect if the bill should be brought in engrossed in an hour's time? Could it not be read the third time then? It was useless for gentlemen to persist in this kind of opposition, where there was so large a majority in favor of the repeal. It would be better to let the bill be read the third time now, and passed, and be done with it.

The question was then put on the suspension of the rules—and decided in the affirmative, ayes 143, noes 28.

Mr. GRANGER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which being ordered,

It was read the third time and passed—yeas 140, nays 71, as follows:

So the bill was passed in the following form:

AN ACT to repeal the Bankrupt Act.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved 19th August, 1841, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures incurred under the said act; but every such proceeding may be continued to its final consummation, in like manner as if this act had not been passed.

[Mr. M. A. COOPER desired to move to be excused from voting; but the Speaker decided that the motion came too late, as the first two names on the roll had already been called.]

Mr. MARK A. COOPER asked to be excused from voting on the bill for the following reasons:

He is desirous to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law, as a true representative of his constituents' opinions, as well as of his own.

The friends of this bill have incorporated into it a proviso, which sanctions all the principles of the bankrupt law; principles which he thinks unconstitutional and unjust, as well as immoral in their effects, and ought not to receive his support. He cannot, therefore, vote for the bill. If it were a mere question of time, he could vote; but that is not the case.

Again: being in favor of the repeal, he cannot vote against the bill; a part of which proposes a repeal of the bankrupt act; because that would be to sanction the existence and operation of the act for an indefinite period.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia in the chair.)

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the committee take up House bill No. 645, being a bill making appropriations for the army, &c.

The motion was agreed to; and the Clerk read the bill through all its sections. It was then read section by section for amendment, and the House passed several without objection. When the item was under consideration which appropriates $90,000 for arsenals—

Mr. DEBERRY moved to strike out $90,000, and insert $110,000, with the specific direction that $20,000 of that sum should be appropriated for the completion of the arsenal at Fayetteville, North Carolina. He went into some statements to show the importance of that arsenal, and the action which had been had in relation thereto by the Legislature of North Carolina; whence instructions had been received by the Senators for that State, and a request by its members in the House of Representatives, that they would give their aid in procuring the necessary appropriations for the completion of that work. It had been going on for several years, but the appropriation hitherto had been too small to enable the Government to complete it; and he now moved his amendment in conformity with the wishes of his State Legislature and of his immediate constituents, amongst whom this arsenal was situated.

Mr. FILLMORE said if the arsenal was in the course of construction, it was provided for by the present appropriation, for the department asked for sums sufficient to carry on all works that were deemed essential; and if this work was not embraced in the detailed statement from the department, he supposed it was not deemed necessary. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no particular designation of arsenals in this bill. The Committee of Ways and Means had recommended all the appropriations asked for by the department; and he trusted, in the present embarrassed state of the treasury, they should not go beyond the estimates.

Mr. McKAY said if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would examine the detailed estimates, he would find that it was not intended to expend any portion of this money on the arsenal in question; the amendment of his colleague was, therefore, a proper one. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had said that it was unnecessary to specify any particular works; but if that gentleman would look at previous acts of Congress, he would find that it had been frequently done; and there was no reason why it should not be done in this case, as the works had been begun, and no appropriation was proposed for their completion.

Mr. FILLMORE replied.

The committee then rose and reported progress.

Mr. PROFFIT moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill to repeal the bankrupt act had been passed.

Mr. CUSHING obtained the floor on the question of reconsideration, and then moved an adjournment.

Mr. FILLMORE requested the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw that motion, that the House might receive some Executive communications which were on the Speaker's table.

Mr. CUSHING consented to do so, with the understanding that he retained the floor on the question of reconsideration when it should come up.

The SPEAKER then presented various Executive communications, mainly consisting of information called for by resolutions of the House. One was a report of the inspectors of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia. Another was a communication from the War Department, in answer to a resolution of the 27th ultimo, requiring a detailed statement of all the expenditures from the Chickasaw fund. Another was a communication in answer to a resolution calling for certified copies of all papers on file relating to the arrest and trial of Louallier by a court-martial, by direction of General Jackson, at New Orleans, in 1815.

Mr. KING of Georgia presented a petition from sundry citizens of Baltimore, praying for the establishment of a steamboat communication between that port and Chagres, South America; which was referred to the Select Committee heretofore appointed on that subject.

On motion of Mr. TURNEY, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 18, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of Congress of 1808 and 1809, statements of all the contracts made by the bureaus under the direction of that department, in the year 1842; which, on motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, was laid on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from the city of New York, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WOODBURY presented a memorial signed by J. Bagby, praying that the bankrupt law may be so modified as to give mechanics a lien on work executed by them; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE presented a petition from William Morrow, praying remuneration in consequence of violations by United States agents of a contract for executing certain works at the United States arsenal in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from citizens of the southern part of Missouri, praying for the removal of the land office from Jackson to Fredericktown, in that State: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, on leave, introduced a bill to apply certain alternate sections of the public domain towards completing works of internal improvement in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Mr. Downing, for reimbursement of money paid by him for clerk-hire in his office as register of a land office; and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill for repaving and repairing a portion of Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Printing, to whom the subject had been referred, made a report (which was concurred in) in favor of printing the communication from the Solicitor of the Treasury in relation to the cloth cases, in which frauds were attempted on the revenue.

Mr. WOODBURY stated that, as the subject of resolutions was now before the Senate, he felt obliged to make a remark as to one introduced at the last session by his former colleague.

Mr. W. regretted that the resolution had not yet been answered. Some of the information desired in it related to the persons and matters connected with the cloth cases, on which a report had just been ordered to be printed. Other reports, containing letters and documents on this topic, and the conduct of those concerned in it, had been printed by Congress at the last session, and distributed widely abroad as well as in this country.

It was due to all concerned that the answer to the call made in the resolution of my late colleague, should go to the world with the other papers bearing on this question. It was supposed to be calculated to throw much light on the whole subject.

The answer may have been delayed or omitted by accident. If so, this notice would revive attention to it in the proper quarter, and would save the introduction of any other resolution asking for the reasons which had prevented a reply hitherto.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the State Department, transmiting in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, further information received at that department concerning the operations of the bankrupt law; which, on motion of Mr. BATES, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmiting, in compliance with the act of Congress of 1804, a report of the names, dates of appointment, and pay of all persons employed in the Indian Department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, referred back, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of the representatives of Baron De Kalb.

THE RED LINES AGAIN.

Mr. BENTON (after some prefatory remarks, to the effect that he had waited for some days till the Senator from Virginia, who had been absent, resumed his seat, for an opportunity to recall that Senator's attention to the error in his printed speech on the subject of the treaty, yet uncorrected,) said, yesterday he was about to do so, when the morning hour expired; and he postponed the subject on that account till now. The error of which he complained was in these words of the Senator's printed speech:

"The Senator who produced it [the map] could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line, indicating the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding minutely and exactly with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks."

This error was not only printed in the Senator's speech, but reprinted in the speech of the Senator from South Carolina; and arguments were based upon it, as if it was a matter of fact. His object now was, to appeal to the Chair for its decision as to the facts of this statement. I ask you, Mr. President, (continued Mr. BENTON,) whether the extract I have just read is correct or not, and whether I was not the first to proclaim the "strong red line," before "other eyes" were required to point it out?

The CHAIR made some remarks not distinctly heard, but it was understood to import an impression that it could hardly be in order to make any statement, unless required by the Senate in regular debate.

Mr. BENTON was understood to say that he did not mean to press an interrogatory out of order.

Mr. BARROW remarked that it seemed to him that the presiding officer of the Senate should not be called upon to state his recollection of facts which were personal to Senators, and about which there was a controversy between two Senators. It was deeply to be regretted that there was any such misunderstanding between Senators as to matters of fact. This subject had been before the Senate twice, and, as he conceived, improperly; and it was now before it again, which rendered it more so. It was more than probable that, if the discussion went on to-day, it would devolve on the Chair to put an end to it; he would therefore be placed in an awkward predicament, if he should be compelled to put an end to a controversy in which, upon the call of a Senator, he had become, on its very threshold, a witness. He merely threw out the suggestion, of which he hoped the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] would perceive the propriety. If the memory of the presiding officer was fresh and fixed as regarded facts of a public character, there would be no impropriety in Senators calling upon him for his recollection of them; but there was certainly an impropriety in pursuing such a course in this case, (when his memory of the transaction must be imperfect,) which was more of a personal than a public nature. The Senator from Missouri had a right to call upon any Senator to give to the Senate his recollection of the facts; but not upon the Chair. He therefore suggested to him, whether his own good sense did not perceive there was an impropriety, under the circumstances, in calling upon the presiding officer to become a witness. There were Senators who had a recollection of this transaction, as well as the presiding officer; their memory was as perfect as his: he suggested, then, whether, under the circumstances of the case, the Senator from Missouri should press this point.

The CHAIR remarked that, if it was the sense of the Senate, he would state his recollection of the transaction. His memory was not as full and exact as he could desire; but, having been called upon most unexpectedly, and having held no conversations upon the subject, within his recollection, he felt some delicacy in making any statement.

Mr. BENTON was understood to remark that there could be no want of delicacy in the presiding officer, before whom the transaction occurred, stating his recollection of the fact.

The CHAIR said he was taken by surprise, but he would put it to the sense of the Senate whether he might be permitted to make a statement. The question was then put to the Senate, and decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON then called upon the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BARROW] to state to the Senate his recollection of the transaction in controversy.

Mr. BARROW then rose, and said that, if he had any distinct recollection of the transaction, he would tell it to the Senate; but, since the matter was first introduced, he had endeavored, for the last two days, to refresh his memory, with a desire to put the matter, so far as he could, on a proper footing. But his recollection was so indistinct, that he would not undertake to state anything positive. He took very little interest in the discussion which sprung up when the map was presented by the Senator from Missouri. He felt very little interest as regarded these lines, and never perused the map when in the possession of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON;] nor afterwards, when it was sent to the seat of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] did he attend there, for the purpose of examining it, as others did. He would state the impression made on his mind on that day; premising that he did not pretend to know anything with certainty in reference to the matter in dispute, as to these lines, at that time. Occupying a seat there [pointing to the seat] when the debate sprung up, he paid no particular attention to what was said by any Senator, for he felt that it was of more importance that the discussion should be interrupted. Having made up his own mind how he should give his vote, he did not feel it incumbent on him to listen. His attention was not therefore attracted to the debate, until struck with the solemn manner in which the Senator from Virginia had introduced the map. This was his impression—whether on sufficient grounds, or not, he would not undertake to say. The map was introduced by the Senator from Missouri. What he said when he called the attention of the Senate to it, and the lines upon it, he did not remember. When the map was transferred to the seat of the Senator from Virginia, there was a collection of about a dozen Senators around it. He never pretended at all to go there. He had no curiosity about it. But the impression made on his mind was, that the map was introduced by the Senator from Missouri, to rebut or destroy the effect (as he understood it) of the map of Mr. Sparks; but that it did not sustain the honorable Senator from Missouri in his position before the examination of the map took place at the seat of the Senator from Virginia. That seemed to be the impression made on the Senate; but whether it was well-grounded or not, he would not undertake to say. He repeated, that he paid no particular attention to what took place when the map was introduced. The Senator from Missouri introduced the map, he had no doubt, for the purpose that he had stated; and he had no doubt, also, that he made the remarks he said he did make when he introduced it. He entertained no doubt on his part at all; but he must say that his recollection was not sufficiently accurate to testify to the facts as they occurred.

Mr. BENTON observed that it was an issue of fact; and, that there could be no mistake, he would read the passage of the Senator's printed speech over again:

"The Senator who produced it [the map] could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line indicating the limits of the United States, according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding minutely and exactly with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks."

Here a thing was stated as a fact, which he (Mr. B.) denied in every particular. And, in contravention of what is therein stated, he asserted that he did see something besides the "microscopic dotted line;" that he not only saw the "strong red line," but that he was the first to proclaim it, to show that Mr. Sparks's discovery was no secret at all. He would now ask his colleague [Mr. LINN] for his recollection of what occurred.

Mr. LINN stated that when the Senator from Virginia introduced Mr. Sparks's map, the impression on his mind was, that there was more importance attached to it than it merited. Indeed, he thought it of so little consequence, that he could recollect he so expressed himself to the Senator from Pennsylvania next to him [Mr. BUCHANAN] at the time; and observed to him that the map ought not to have been introduced in the debate, as the question would not turn on that point then; for it had been settled by our forefathers, that the boundary claimed by Maine was the one intended; but if we were going to make a sacrifice for the sake of peace, we ought to do it frankly. While he (Mr. L.) was conversing on this point with the Senator from Pennsylvania, his colleague [Mr. BENTON] raised his voice and cried out, "Here are the bloody lines—the red lines;" and he went on to remark that it was no secret at all, because it was in Mr. Jefferson's collection of maps and books, and had been for years open to the inspection of every one in the Library of Congress. And what brought it more distinctly to his recollection, was his colleague's remark—that it came from the collection of one distinguished for his care in collecting and keeping everything that was of interest to his country—Mr. Jefferson. He (Mr. L.) had discharged his mind of all impressions about the introduction of Mr. Sparks's map, because he never attached any importance to the sort of evidence it could furnish; nor, indeed, to the point made upon it. And with regard to the object for which his colleague introduced Mr. Jefferson's map, his impression was, that it was to prove there was no secret; but beyond that object, he did not recollect any other, unless it was to prove that there should be no importance whatever attached to Mr. Sparks's map. His impression was, indeed, that his colleague had no other object in view, when he brought forward his map. He wished to show that we had, for years, had just such a map in our own archives, open to public inspection.

Mr. ARCHER said he earnestly hoped that the matter would be allowed to stop here. He was convinced there had been nothing but a diversity of sentiment, reflecting in no degree on either Senator; and he could see no reason, therefore, for so much sensitiveness on the part of the Senator from Missouri. He hoped that, in this view of the matter, which he believed was concurred in by Senators on all sides, the subject would be allowed to drop. It was rare, indeed, that all the minute transactions of but a few weeks gone by, were retained distinctly in the recollection of gentlemen. This was his own case in the present instance. He had not the smallest recollection of the particulars which had been alluded to, or he would have interposed and endeavored to terminate the controversy. As it evidently appeared to be a mere difference of impression on the part of the honorable Senators, he hoped the question would be allowed to rest, without any further debate.

Mr. CALHOUN said, as allusion had been made to him, he deemed it proper to state what his recollection was of the facts, as far as he himself was concerned. His impression at the time was, that the map from the library was produced by the Senator from Missouri for the purpose of rebutting and invalidating the one in the possession of the gentleman from Virginia. His impression was, further, that when the map was being unfolded by the Senator from Missouri, and his eye caught the dotted line, he called the attention of the Senate to it, as being the true boundary line, and as differing from the line described in Mr. Sparks's map, inasmuch as it ran in a more northerly direction. This was his impression, though he might have been in error. He had himself supposed that the red marks delineated the boundaries of counties, or of States; but he found afterwards that this supposition was wrong. And the general impression resting upon his mind was, that the map produced by the Senator from Missouri did not sustain him in what he (Mr. CALHOUN) believed to be his object, viz: in rebutting the other map.

These were the impressions he entertained at the time, and they had not been changed since. He would take this occasion to remark, that he hoped another debate in secret session would never be published. He thought the precedent was going to be highly pernicious; it would probably operate as a restriction upon the liberty of debate. He had written out his own speech reluctantly, and only with a view, as other speeches were being published, of putting himself right; and in writing that speech, he had taken the general run of the facts, without entering into the minute details, which, in a case like that, could have but little influence upon the public mind.

Mr. BENTON reiterated that, in the presence of forty-eight Senators, (most of whom were present on the occasion,) he was the first himself to proclaim the red line. He not only could see them, contrary to the words he had quoted; but he did not, as they assert, leave it to "other eyes" to be applied to the map to discover them. He proclaimed them aloud from his seat. This was the issue of fact. And on it he appealed to the Senators around him for their recollections.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut observed that, according to his recollection, when the Senator from Missouri heard of Sparks's map, he raised the map in his own hands, and exclaimed, "here are the bloody red lines." The words were so remarkable, that they made a strong impression on his mind.

Mr. BENTON asked if he had any recollection of allusion being made to the "secret?"

Mr. SMITH replied that his recollection was rather indistinct about that; but still his impression was, that it must have been to show there was no secret about it.

Mr. ALLEN observed that this was (to say the least of it) a very troublesome dispute, growing out of a deeply exciting discussion which had taken place with closed doors, and in consequence of the additional circumstance that the matter had not been noticed at the time by any reporter. His impression was, that there was no real difference between the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Missouri. The difference was barely as to the form of the question now made—the one adhering to the object for which the map was introduced, and the other to the fact of the announcement of the broad red line which was visible to every one. Believing, then, that there was nothing substantial involved in the controversy, he must be permitted to express his regret that the matter should be deemed sufficiently important to occupy the attention of the Senate.

He had hitherto remained quiet, and volunteered no opinion nor expression of his impressions upon the subject; but, being now particularly called upon, he could state very readily what those impressions were; and he did so with a perfect conviction that the statement could not reflect in the least degree on any member of that body, in one way or the other. His attention was attracted to the fact of the introduction of the map by the Senator from Virginia, by the solemnity with which it was introduced; the Senator evidently regarding it as a matter of peculiar importance, and calling the attention of the Senate very pointedly to the map.

While this part of the discussion was going on, the Senator from Missouri (according to his recollection of the case) obtained an old atlas, and spreading open a map, exclaimed, "here is the red line." As to the motive with which the Senator from Missouri introduced the atlas, his recollection was not very distinct; but the circumstance of the red line having been pointed out by him he (Mr. A.) particularly remembered, in consequence of the manner in which the Senator had called attention to it, being devoid of that deference or courtesy which he (Mr. A.) conceived was due to the gentleman who had possession of the floor. As to the fact of the announcement of the red line, he recollected distinctly that the Senator from Missouri made use of the word "bloody." He might not perhaps have recollected the circumstance, but for the phrase made use of by the Senator; which, of itself, was calculated to make an impression upon the memory. He repeated, that he did not conceive that this statement could affect either Senator, one way or the other; for he did not conceive that there was any essential difference between the Senators—the one contending as to the object for which the map was produced, and the failure of that object; and the other as to the announcement of the broad red line.

Mr. RIVES begged leave to say that he did not think it at all necessary to enter into the discussion of the matter with any spirit of controversy, but——

The CHAIR here interrupted the Senator from Virginia, with a request that he might be permitted to explain the preceding remarks he had made. The Chair then stated that his recollection was refreshed by the remarks which had fallen from the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN.] They reminded him that he had held a conversation with him, and in which conversation that Senator accorded with his recollection, that there was no substantial difference between the two Senators. The Chair superadded the remark, that if it was the sense of the Senate, he would add that no issue was made up on the fact of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] having announced the red lines. That, on a previous occasion, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] had remarked that he could not have fallen into the absurdity of imputing the design to the Senator from Missouri, of an intended suppression of the red line, with the view to impose upon the Senate or the country. That the recollection of the Chair was, that the red line was announced; but the ground of his supposition, that there was no substantial difference between the Senators, was, that the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, complained of, were not literal and exact, but only figurative. They had been so regarded by the Chair. And if the Chair might use the expression, he had understood the expression of the Senator from Virginia to mean, that the mind's eye of the Senator from Missouri was so engrossed with the microscopic dotted line, that he gave none, or scarcely any, consideration to the plain or palpable red line; and that his opinion on this point was much fortified by the statement made by the Senator from Virginia on a previous occasion, that he could not, or did not, design the absurdity of attempting to produce the impression, either upon the Senate or the public mind, that the Senator from Missouri attempted to exhibit the dotted line, and at the same time to suppress or conceal the existence of the red line, which was bold and strongly marked on the same map.

Mr. RIVES said he desired to say a word or two, for the purpose of placing the matter in its true attitude before the public, though he doubted whether the public were disposed to take any interest in the matter at all. He concurred entirely in the very candid and sober view of the matter which had been presented by the Chair, and by the Senator from Ohio, with regard to the red line and the dotted line. The whole difference between the Senator from Missouri and himself, reduced itself to a mere matter of opinion, as had been very justly remarked. He would state, most distinctly, that his own impression in regard to the expressions used by the Senator from Missouri, was, that the Senator had not referred to the red lines at all; though it was possible that the words might have been spoken, without having reached his ears, as there was some confusion at the time, and as he (Mr. RIVES) was then speaking. At all event, the circumstance, if it so occurred, had made no impression upon his mind; and he had consequently no recollection of it. What he desired to say was (what had been so happily expressed by the Chair,) that it was the mind's eye by which the red line was disregarded; the red line might have been seen, but, if seen, not recognised as the true boundary; but the microscopic dotted line was insisted on by the Senator as being the true boundary. And he was confirmed in this opinion, by referring to the printed speech of the Senator from Missouri; in which he insisted, in three distinct places, upon the dotted line as being the true boundary; and, according to the recollection of the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Missouri made the remark, that any little school miss might have drawn the red line.

The Senator from Missouri seemed disposed to leave entirely in the dark the object for which he had introduced the map, and confined himself to the expression (which, undoubtedly, was intended to be understood as a figurative expression) that the broad red line could not be seen until other eyes were applied to it. He had never intended to deny that the Senator announced the red line; but what he asserted was, that the Senator had insisted upon the microscopic dotted line as being the true boundary. The whole question, then, was, in truth, a difference of impression or of recollection as to the object for which the map had been introduced. He (Mr. R.) had honestly stated his own impression as to what that object was, and that he considered the Senator as having failed to accomplish that object and in that opinion he believed he was sustained by a very large majority of the Senate. With regard to the other point, it was a matter of form merely.

Mr. BENTON said he was entirely satisfied with the explanation of the Senator from Virginia. He would now drop everything that had passed, and would merely read to the Senate the last letter which was ever written by Dr. Franklin; it was written in the year 1790, and addressed to Mr. Jefferson, who was at that time Secretary of State.

Copy of the last letter written by Dr. Franklin.

"PHILADELPHIA, April 8, 1790.

"SIR: I received your letter of the 31st of last past, relating to encroachments made on the eastern limits of the United States, by settlers under the British Government, pretending that it is the western, and not the eastern river of the bay of Passamaquoddy, which was designated by the name of St. Croix, in the treaty of peace with that nation, and requesting of me to communicate any facts which my memory or papers may enable me to recollect, and which may indicate the true river which the commissioners on both sides had in their view to establish as the boundary between the two nations.

"Your letter found me under a severe fit of my malady, which prevented my answering it sooner, or attending, indeed, to any kind of business. I now can assure you that I am perfectly clear in the remembrance that the map we used in tracing the bounsdary was brought to the treaty by the commissioners from England; and that it was the same that was published by Mitchell above twenty years before. Having a copy of that map by me in loose sheets, I send you that sheet which contains the bay of Passamaquoddy, where you will see that part of the boundary traced. I remember, too, that in that part of the boundary we relied much on the opinion of Mr. Adams, who had been concerned in some former disputes concerning those territories. I think, therefore, that you may obtain still farther light from him.

"That the map we used was Mitchell's map, Congress were acquainted at the time, by letter to their Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which, I suppose, may be found upon their files.

"I have the honor to be, with the greatest esteem and respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

"B. FRANKLIN.

"To THOMAS JEFFERSON,
"Secretary of State of the United States."

Mr. B. said that this put an end to Mr. Sparks's map. This letter shows that Mitchell's map, and not D'Anville's map, was that Dr. Franklin used for showing our title; and here is that map, showing our boundary along the mountain ridge by Quebec and the St. Lawrence, and going to the northwest corner of Nova Scotia, within a quarter of an inch of the river on this map—within ten or fifteen miles of it, in fact. This shows that Mr. Sparks's discovery in Paris is not the measure of our title to the Northeastern boundary.

Here the subject dropped.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The CHAIR announced the order of the day to be the unfinished debate on the passage of the bill for the settlement and occupation of the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. CHOATE, being entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate for nearly two hours. The two main topics upon which he dwelt, were: first, the question of the proposed grant of lands to settlers, as an infraction of the convention between this country and Great Britain, established for ten years in 1818, and renewed in 1827, to continue from year to year until discontinued by a year's notice from either party; and next, the question of the settlement of other difficulties with England by the late treaty, without also settling that in relation to the Oregon Territory.

In the course of his remarks, he stated that his only objection to the bill was in relation to the provision making a grant of lands. If it was recommitted, and that provision was stricken out, the rest of the bill should have his hearty concurrence. Even if the bill remained in its present shape, and it could be satisfactorily proved to him that this provision, which proposes a grant of land to settlers, is not an infraction of the treaty, he would give it his support. He would go further; he would say, that if the year's notice were given of our intention to relinquish the treaty with Great Britain, he would, after the cessation of our obligations under it, most cheerfully support a bill of this kind. But he conceived the whole question, at present, was, whether this bill, in its present form, would not be a violation of our obligations under the treaty; and that it would, he had not now the slightest doubt.

Here Mr. C. went into an examination of the terms of the treaty, with a view of showing that the only occupation or settlement which could take place in good faith, was a joint occupation and settlement for purposes of trade, hunting, and trapping; and that Great Britain never had in any single instance otherwise interpreted the treaty, or acted upon it. Her encouragement of the Hudson Bay Company was for purposes of trade and hunting, strictly in conformity with the treaty. If the company had built forts and made settlements, it was in furtherance of the objects of trade, and carrying on the trapping and hunting in which it was engaged. It was perfectly open to us, under the treaty, to do the same. He denied that England had extended over the country an exclusive jurisdiction. She only applied her own laws to her own subjects. We might do the same. If it could be shown that she ever granted away a single acre of the territory, or exercised an exclusive right of that kind, he would then say that we might do the same. But no such thing could be shown, for it had not been done.

As to the allegations that England, in a communication with the ministers of our Government, had said that British interests had grown up in the territory, which should and would be protected, he contended, that taking the whole context, and giving what followed in the sentence, so far from this being an assertion of exclusive right, or a threat of possession against the United States, the most direct reservation was made of the rights of the United States to joint occupation and interest in the territory under the treaty, by which both countries were bound. He read the passage in full, with a view of showing the correctness of his view of the avowal made by England.

In commenting upon the speech of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] who had preceded him in the discussion when the subject was last up, he took occasion to remove an erroneous impression, which he conceived was calculated to do great injustice to a distinguished man, [Mr. Webster,] who could not there defend himself. He alluded to the fears expressed by the Senator from Missouri, that the President's message declining to furnish the correspondence, or informal communications, relative to the pending negotiation about the Oregon Territory, implied grounds for concluding that propositions had been made by our Secretary of State, which the Administration was ashamed or afraid to avow; that, in fact, the rumor must be correct which had got abroad, that a proposition had been made or entertained, by the Secretary of State, to settle down upon the Columbia river as the boundary line. Now, he was glad to have it in his power to undeceive the Senator, and to assure him, which he did from authority—for he had been requested by the Secretary himself to do it for him—that he never either made or entertained a proposition to admit of any line south of the 49th parallel of latitude, as a negotiable boundary line for the territory of the United States.

After Mr. C. had considerably more at large, and in his own words, (the purport of which is only attempted in this sketch,) fully explained this matter, he next turned to so much of the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, as condemned the late treaty with Great Britain in relation to the Northeastern boundary line. He entered into a long, minute, and topographical inquiry and explanation, with a view of showing that the course pursued by the Secretary of State was the most advantageous ever attempted for this country in any previous negotiation with Great Britain. Having argued this point elaborately, he turned to the line agreed upon through the great Western lakes, with a view of proving that we had in reality—and not merely seemingly, as the Senator from Missouri supposed—gained four millions of acres of land. He quoted a pamphlet, (said to be written by Lord Palmerston,) to show that the most intelligent English statesmen considered that we had immeasurably the best of the bargain in the late treaty, and particularly as to the acquisition of this four millions of acres in the West. He traced the line from Pigeon river to the Lake of the Woods, as agreed upon, with a view of showing that it was the identical line stipulated by the treaty of 1783, as no other water-course was known till 1803 but the southern water-course adopted as the true line in the late treaty.

In conclusion, Mr. C. hoped the bill would be recommitted, and (the provision granting lands being stricken out) that the measure would be adopted.

Mr. BENTON replied to so much of the Senator's remarks as touched upon his speech; and insisted that the same line to which the Senator's concluding remarks alluded, was thirty or forty miles north of that which the Senator supposed.

Mr. B.'s remarks (which were mostly statistical) will be given in full in a day or two.

Mr. MOREHEAD next obtained the floor; and, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, Janduary 18, 1843.

Mr. READ presented two remonstrances, signed by citizens of Pennsylvania, against the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RIGGS presented the petition of citizens of Whitewater, in the Territory of Wisconsin, praying the construction of a harbor at Milwaukie, in said Territory, for the protection of the commerce of the upper lakes.

Mr. GWIN offered the following resolution; and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a joint resolution, authorizing the appointment of a special agent to inquire into the alleged frauds under the pre-emption laws; the appointment of such agent having been recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his annual report.

Also, that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to amend the existing and former pre-emption laws, so as to permit the heirs or representatives of those who settled on the public lands with the intention of availing themselves of the privileges of the pre-emption laws, but who died before the forms required by said laws had been complied with, to enter the same, if satisfactory evidence is produced that the settler or settlers, if living, would be entitled to said land.

Mr. GWIN also offered the following resolution, and it was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House all the information in possession of the Navy Department in regard to the naval depot of the United States at Port Mahon, and especially whether any vessels of the United States Mediterranean squadron have been kept for any length of time in said port inactive; and if so, how long; and whether any of the officers have heretofore established themselves, during such period, on shore at that place, and for what length of time, for the purpose of keeping house, and the names of such vessels and of said officers; and further to state whether any, and what, reforms have been contemplated, or are considered to be necessary, in regard to the condition and conduct of the Mediterranean squadron in these particulars.

Mr. GWIN also offered the following resolution; and it was adopted, after an amendment had been agreed to, on the motion of Mr. KING:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House the amount of the daily expenses, exclusive of the pay of the officers and crew, of the Missouri and Mississippi steam-frigates, respectively, while in service; and to specify the amount of fuel consumed by each daily, including the amount of wastage, where the said fuel has been purchased, from whom, by whom, and at what price.

Mr. GWIN asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, (if in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public service,) whatever information may be in his possession in relation to the recent capture of Monterey, in California, by Commodore T. Ap Catesby Jones; and to state whether the said Jones had any instructions from the Government which were intended should be construed into authority for such proceedings.

Mr. LINN objected, and the resolution was not received.

Mr. BRIGGS offered the following, and it was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving a pension to John Cary, a free colored man, a native of the county of Westmoreland, and State of Virginia, now resident of this District, who says he was a body servant of General Washington at the time of Braddock's defeat, in 1755, and was present at that battle; and also, that he was a servant of General Washington at the surrender of Cornwallis, in 1781; and who is believed to be 112 years old.

Mr. TILLINGHAST rose to a privileged question, and then explained that an error had occurred in recording his vote on a motion made yesterday to fix 10 o'clock, A. M. as the hour of meeting on Friday and Saturday next, which are days appropriated by the rules to private business. Having caused a correction of the journal, he moved a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to lay that resolution on the table, observing that gentlemen who voted to meet early did not come to the House at the time fixed.

Mr. COWEN called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and the motion was laid on the table.

Mr. REYNOLDS rose to a privileged question; and was understood to move the reconsideration of some vote, which was not distinctly heard.

Mr. EVERETT desired to move a suspension of the rules, to enable the House to proceed with and dispose of, the question of reconsideration of the vote of yesterday on the passage of the bankrupt law; which was moved by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT.] He thought that should be disposed of before the House proceeded to any other business.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose (as he said) of taking up the bill for the satisfaction of claims for French spoliations prior to 1800.

Mr. EVERETT, on an explanation being given that the question of reconsideration which he wished to dispose of, would come up of course after the morning hour, withdrew his motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ADAMS then pressed his motion, and called for the yeas and nays upon it; which were ordered, and resulted as follows—yeas 107, nays 78.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

So the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the army.

Mr. PROFFITT moved to take up the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road.

The CHAIR said that the motion was not in order—the army appropriation bill having the priority—and must be postponed, in order to take up other business.

Mr. ADAMS then moved to postpone the bill, for the purpose of taking up the bill providing indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800.

Mr. PICKENS called for tellers, which were ordered; and, on taking the question, they [Messrs. SAUNDERS and READ] reported ayes 78, noes 80.

So the motion of Mr. ADAMS was rejected.

[When the committee rose yesterday, the question pending was on the following amendment submitted by Mr. DEBERRY:

"For arsenals, one hundred and ten thousand dollars; twenty thousand dollars of which to be applied towards completing the arsenal now under train of construction at Fayetteville, North Carolina."]

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. DEBERRY, it was decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. DEBERRY then called for tellers, which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS then renewed his motion to postpone the bill, for the purpose of taking up the French spoliation bill.

Mr. READ inquired if the motion was in order, a similar one having just been rejected.

The CHAIR said that it was, there having been intervening business since the same motion was made and rejected, viz: the call for and ordering of tellers on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DEBERRY.]

Mr. READ called for tellers on the motion; which were ordered.

Mr. FILLMORE expressed the opinion that motions of this kind should not be made oftener than once a day; for, by moving them in this way, just after they had been rejected, as was done by the gentleman from Massachusetts, a great and unnecessary waste of time was occasioned.

Mr. PICKENS observed that, if proceedings like this were to be tolerated, there would be no getting on with the business of the House; they would never be able to tell what they were about to do.

The CHAIR repeated his decision, that the motion was in order; and the question was taken by the tellers, (Messrs. WELLER and STRATTON,) who reported ayes 68, noes 78.

So Mr. ADAMS's motion was again rejected.

The question recurring on Mr. DEBERRY's amendment,

Mr. McKAY suggested to his colleague to modify it, so as not to increase the appropriation, but to make it obligatory on the Secretary of War to apply $10,000 of the balance of the appropriation of last year, now on hand, to the arsenal at Fayetteville. Mr. McK. said that there was an appropriation of $120,000 made last year, with the understanding that $10,000 of it should be applied to the North Carolina arsenal; and of this appropriation, he had ascertained that over $94,000 now remained unexpended in the treasury. All that was wanted, therefore, was to direct the application of a part of this sum to the object his colleague had in view. If his colleague would modify his amendment in the manner he had suggested, he presumed that no gentleman would object to it, as there would in that case be no increase of the appropriation.

Mr. DEBERRY had no particular objection to the course of his colleague, but his constituents were anxious for the appropriation which he had proposed. They strongly suspected that there was no intention on the part of the department to make this anything more than a mere arsenal of deposite. It was for this reason that the Legislature of North Carolina interfered and passed resolutions. He urged the propriety and necessity for completing this arsenal, since it was the only arsenal south of the Potomac. He did not believe in the sincerity of those officers of the department, who held out that they intended to complete the work. His constituents were tired of being tantalized and humbugged, and it was now several years since any progress had been made. He expressed his willingness to modify his amendment according to the suggestion of his colleague, [Mr. McKAY,] so as to authorize the Secretary of War to appropriate $10,000 of the money now on hand to the completion of the arsenal at Fayetteville.

Mr. McKAY read a letter from the officer under whose charge the work was; from which it appeared that a large quantity of materials was now on hand for the construction of the work, and the Government would suffer injury by allowing the works to remain much longer in their present situation.

Mr. GILMER opposed the amendment. He thought the principle wrong. He saw no reason why Congress should make any exception in favor of the arsenal in North Carolina, when the process of restricting all the expenditures of the Government was going on.

Mr. GRAHAM replied, and sustained the amendment. He contended that the Legislature should interfere in this matter. The case was peculiar. In addition to the fact that the materials were on hand, he urged the fact that no other arsenal existed south of the Potomac.

Mr. FILLMORE said, if an unexpended balance remained over from last year, it was unnecessary to give the direction in relation to the North Carolina arsenal. Let the department make the expenditure. He urged, moreover, that the proposed division of a part of the appropriation for arsenals to the North Carolina arsenal would endanger the public property elsewhere.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed a desire to have the Fayetteville arsenal completed; and pressed upon the committee the consideration, that, whilst there were many arsenals throughout the Northern and Eastern States, there was none in the South and Southwest. He advocated a reorganization and overhauling of the whole system of arsenals, contending that there were too many in some sections, and not enough in others.

Mr. GILMER inquired whether this appropriation was to complete arsenals already begun, or to erect new arsenals, or for the custody of arms.

Mr. FILLMORE said that there were but two arsenals begun which were not finished. The appropriation was mainly intended for repairs; for the items of which expenditure he referred to document No. 45.

Mr. GILMER concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that there were too many arsenals at present. He should move to reduce the appropriation from $90,000 to $50,000, so as to expend money only on those absolutely necessary.

The CHAIR decided the motion would not be in order at this time.

Mr. GILMER said he had so supposed, but now gave notice of his intention to make it at the proper time.

Mr. SAUNDERS replied to various gentlemen who had opposed the appropriation. He thought it due at least to the wishes of the State Legislature of North Carolina to make this small appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. MERIWETHER complained that he was in the dark as to the propriety of this appropriation. He did not understand the reason for many of the proposed items of appropriation, and wished for information before he could consent to vote away the public money.

Mr. GRAHAM explained, for the information of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. MERIWETHER.]

The question was then put on the amendment; and, as 16 only rose in its favor,

Mr. DEBERRY withdrew it.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia moved to strike out the whole appropriation, and insert an appropriation of $25,000 for the completion of arsenals at Little Rock, Ark., and Fayetteville, N. C. He said that the arsenals, it must be admitted, were in decent and reputable condition, especially as $90,000 of the money previously appropriated for their repair was yet unexpended. But, beyond this, it was stated by gentlemen on that floor that many of the arsenals were unnecessary; and, as the treasury of the country was, and was likely to continue, in an embarrassed condition, he had proposed to strike out the whole appropriation, and substitute a sum which would be sufficient for two arsenals, at points where it was obvious they were requisite.

Mr. GILMER called the attention of his colleague to the detailed estimates, which would show him that $10,000 only was required for each of the arsenals for which he proposed to make appropriation.

Mr. SMITH acted on the suggestion, and substituted $20,000 for $25,000.

Mr. FILLMORE expressed his surprise at the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia. He said an appropriation was necessary to repair the arsenals, both for their preservation and the preservation of the arms which they contained; and further, he deprecated the basing of legislation on unauthorized statements. Instead of $90,000 unexpended, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, there was only some $70,000; and it must be borne in mind, that that sum was appropriated to defray such expenses as should be required in the interval, up to the 1st of July, and it was for the period subsequent to that day that the appropriation under consideration was to be made.

Mr. SMITH said there was no proposition more clear than that the buildings were in good condition and repair; and, according to the gentleman's own admission, there was some $70,000 unexpended, and therefore he could not be justly charged with a desire to leave the public property to go to ruin. He then justified his motion on other grounds. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CALHOUN] had shown that some of the arsenals were unnecessary, and therefore it was their obvious duty to put them out of existence; but, in justification of his amendment, especially in relation to the arsenal at Little Rock, he reminded the committee of the proximity of 40,000 Indian warriors to that country, who could sweep its occupants from that portion of this Union.

Mr. CROSS opposed the amendment in some remarks, which were not distinctly heard.

The amendment was then negatived.

Mr. GILMER moved to strike out $90,000 and insert $50,000.

The motion was negatived.

Several items were then read and passed without amendment.

When the Clerk read the item making an appropriation for further military surveys,

Mr. GILMER said he thought that was a branch of the public service which could be suspended, and he moved to strike out that appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means how that money was expended. He thought there were men amongst the officers of this country that were competent to make these surveys.

Mr. FILLMORE understood that there was a considerable additional expense beyond that of mere officers, such as clerk-hire, transportation, &c.

Mr. SMITH observed that they had very large annual expenditures for transportation, and a number of officers of high pay. It seemed to him that the military service should be exclusively employed in these surveys. It was by employing other persons than the regular officers of the Government, that the expenditures of the Government were swelled up to such an extent.

Mr. FILLMORE spoke of the great importance of the surveys, and said that they were made so as to be ready whenever it might be necessary to erect fortifications.

Mr. SMITH observed that there were two or three different classes of fortifications, covering the whole frontier; and he could not imagine the necessity for an appropriation as small as this. He thought that these surveys were more for the purpose of giving good jobs to the officers above their regular pay, than for any real benefit to the country. Our officers were so well paid, that it was not necessary to give them such jobs to eke out their means of living.

The question was then taken on Mr. FILLMORE's motion, and it was rejected.

Mr. CALHOUN desired to ask the chairman of the committee what was meant by the clause "for expenses for preparing drawings for artillery." The reason he asked was, there was generally a proviso in the appropriation bills, that there should be no extra compensation paid to any officers, or other persons in the employment of the department. Yet, notwithstanding this proviso, the committee of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILMER] was at the head, had ferreted out the fact that many of the ordnance officers received an extra compensation of $2 per day, in addition to their regular pay, for preparing drawings of artillery. Now, it appeared to him that this kind of work was part of the regular duty of these officers, for which they received regular pay.

Mr. FILLMORE explained that there had been a board of officers appointed for the purpose of making every part of the artillery uniform, and that a draughtsman was employed to assist them. The committee, considering the extra pay of this board an abuse, struck it out of the appropriation of last year, and this year there was no estimate for it. The pay of the draughtsman, however, was estimated for; and this, with the incidental expenses of stationery, &c., made up this item.

Mr. CALHOUN said that as there had been a provision inserted in the former appropriation bills, that no person in regular pay should receive any extra compensation, the law had been trampled on by the department in making such allowances; and he would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] to call up his bill as soon as possible, to correct this and all similar abuses.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked if this $1,200 was for the purchase of paper alone.

Mr. FILLMORE answered, for drawing paper, ink, &c.

Mr. SMITH then observed, that this "and so forth" might include everything.

Mr. GILMER wished to call the attention of the committee to the fact, that in this bill there were $65,000 appropriated, by three clauses in juxtaposition, and all for the same general and specific purposes. First, there was a clause appropriating $15,000 for the surveys for the military defences of the country, inland and Atlantic; secondly, for military and geographical surveys west of the Mississippi, $15,000 for the half calendar year, and $15,000 for the fiscal year—making $30,000; and, thirdly, for the continuation of the surveys on the Northern lakes, $30,000. He did not wish to stop all those surveys, but it seemed to him that the two first were for the same objects. It seemed to him that there was a looseness, not only about the mode of appropriating the public money, but about its expenditure; and he pledged himself to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CALHOUN] to cooperate with him in checking such a course of things.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN moved to strike out the appropriation for the continuation of the surveys of the North and Northwestern lakes; for, according to the opinions held by many gentlemen there, they could not be carried on correctly without the superintendence of Mr. Hassler. We have (said Mr. B.) immediately following this appropriation, very large appropriations for the Military Academy, where for years they had been educating young men for the scientific purposes of the Government. They had an engineer corps, also, whose officers received very high salaries; and everybody must be satisfied that there were enough of them to make all the surveys, both inland and Atlantic, and carry on all the scientific works of the Government, without employing other persons. He was for employing these officers in these works; and if they were not competent, to get others in their places. These surveys cost somewhere about half a million yearly, and nobody knew where they were going on. It was time that this business was systematized, so that they might know what they were doing, and how much they were expending on it.

Mr. FILLMORE spoke of the importance of these surveys, and explained the difference between them. The object was to make them for the purpose of ascertaining the points at which fortifications would be necessary on the Gulf, on the lakes, and on the Atlantic frontier. Mr. F. handed up to the Chair a letter from the War Department, showing the importance and utility of these surveys; which was read.

Mr. C. BROWN wished to know if these surveys were made by the regular officers of the Government, or by other persons. He did not wish to stop these surveys, and was willing to incur all the incidental expenses connected with them; but he objected to the expense of employing other persons, when the Government had officers enough under regular pay.

Mr. FILLMORE believed that the work was carried on by the regular officers of the Government.

Mr. C. BROWN said that, if the gentleman meant that these surveys were for the purpose of ascertaining points for fortifications, he looked upon them as a useless expense; for, considering the changes taking place in the system of fortifications, together with the increase in the population of different parts of the country surveyed, it would be impossible now to say where it would be best to have fortifications, or of what description they should be, some years hence. He thought the officers had better be employed in walking about the streets, than making surveys with such objects in view.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to strike out $30,000, and insert $20,000 for the surveys of the North and Northwestern lakes. He said that $20,000 was sufficient, inasmuch as the department had only estimated for that sum, though the committee had given $30,000.

Mr. M. read a letter from Captain Williams, of the engineer corps, for the purpose of showing that an appropriation of $20,000 would be amply sufficient.

Mr. FILLMORE argued that the increased appropriation proposed would be greatly beneficial, in completing the survey at an earlier day than it could be done under present arrangements.

Mr. MERIWETHER contended that the present was not the time to increase such appropriations—a time when the Secretary of the Treasury told us the tariff would have to be altered so as to add $3,000,000 to the revenue of the Government. He hoped that the sum of $20,000, asked for by the officer in charge of the work, who was on the spot and knew everything about it, would be granted, instead of $30,000 as asked for by Col. Abert, who lived in Washington, and never saw the work in question.

Some conversation here took place between Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON and FILLMORE as to whether this item was not proposed and rejected last session; the result of which was, that such was not the fact.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia said that, if he understood the question rightly, the amendment involved the question whether there should be an increase of the present annual appropriation, for the purpose of completing the survey at an earlier day than was now contemplated. He argued that, in our present condition, it was better to leave expenditures as they were, than to incur any increase.

The question was put, and the amendment rejected.

Mr. REYNOLDS then rose, and moved to amend the bill, by adding after the 122d line, an item providing for an appropriation of $20,000 for a military survey from Council Bluffs, on the Mississippi, to the mouth of the Columbia river, in Oregon Territory. He stated that he desired to have this item inserted in lieu of the item of $20,000 "for surveys west of the Mississippi. The Chair, however, informed him that it would not be order to move to amend that item, as it had been passed upon by the committee; and it was for this reason that he offered the amendment to come in at the end of the section. He then addressed the House in a strain of forcible reasoning in favor of his amendment. It was not, as gentlemen might think, an extraordinary proposition. It was important as bearing upon the proposed settlement of Oregon Territory; and he hoped that gentlemen would not be so squeamish as to refuse to allow our citizens to take possession of that territory, merely because England pretended to have a right to it. If England had any claim whatever to the soil of Oregon, it was confined to that portion above, the mouth of the Columbia, where the survey he proposed would not touch. He expressed an anxious desire that the attention of members should be called to this subject, in order that they might consider the propriety of hereafter constructing a military road in Oregon. For the purpose of giving an opportunity to gentlemen to weigh the matter well in their own minds, he would move that the committee rise, and then let the question be taken on his proposition tomorrow.

Mr. FILLMORE appealed to the gentleman to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. REYNOLDS consented to do so.

Mr. FILLMORE entered into an explanation of the subject, and urged that there was no necessity for the specific appropriation wished by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. REYNOLDS] The amount appropriated in this bill for surveys, exceeded that appropriated for some years past. The item, too, for surveys west of the Mississippi river, ($20,000,) might, under the direction of the department, be applied towards the very object desired by the gentleman, [Mr. REYNOLDS] The House, he thought, should not decide upon the manner in which this appropriation should be expended, but should leave it to the department. He also would remind the gentleman from Illinois that there was already a survey or map in existence, which had been prepared by Captain Wilkes when on the exploring expedition.

Mr. REYNOLDS replied generally to the objections of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE.] He contended that Congress—elected for two years, and more responsible to the people than any public officer—was better qualified to decide what surveys were best for the interest of the Government, than either the Secretary of War or the President. If he were anxious to know as to surveys about Buffalo or the surrounding country, he would sooner take the statements of the gentleman, (its Representative,) than all the secretaries in the country. So, too, he would rather have the opinions of the Representatives of the people, coming from every part of the Union, in relation to these local surveys, than those of public officers in Washington city. As to the map of Captain Wilkes, referred to by the gentleman, that might be very good in its way, and very accurate and very pretty; but he did not want a survey or map of Columbia river only. That might be well enough for navigation; but it would not answer the purposes of the people, who wished a military route to Oregon, in order that they might go there with their families and settle.

Mr. R. concluded by moving that the committee now rise: previous to putting which motion, some conversation took place between Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, FILLMORE, and CALHOUN, in relation to a bill to prohibit extra allowances to public officers; the result of which conversation was an agreement to have the Committee of the Whole discharged from the further consideration of said bill, instead of reporting it to the House.

The motion that the committee rise was then put, and carried.

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the bill prohibiting extra allowances to officers of the Government.

Mr. McKENNAN asked if it had been before a committee.

Mr. ARNOLD said it had not.

Mr. FILLMORE had no doubt it was a very proper bill.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. BLACK, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to amend the several acts organizing the Governments of the several Territories of the United States; and it was read twice and committed.

Mr. MALLORY offered a resolution requiring the Secretary of War to report to this House a practicable plan for the reduction of the expenditure of the Military Academy at West Point, and to limit the number of cadets, so as to correspond with the wants of the country and the strength of the army.

Mr. CUSHING objected, and the resolution was not considered.

Mr. J. T. MASON presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Maryland, in relation to the stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FILLMORE presented a statement of the receipts of the Government for the last quarter; which was ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 19, 1843.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of Indiana, on the subject of the rigid construction given by the Postmaster General to the post office laws. Mr. S. remarked that there was much feeling in the whole Western country concerning a regulation of that department, making pamphlets and newspapers (which may happen to have the name of the person sending such matters through the mail) chargeable with letter postage. Great difficulty and much feeling are the consequence of such construction of the post office laws, especially in the State of Indiana; so much so, that the attention of the Legislature had been called to the subject, and that body have passed the resolutions he then presented, urging a repeal or modification of that portion of the laws of the department which justified such a regulation. He hoped the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which he proposed to refer the resolutions, would give the subject their attention. The resolutions were then referred, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs or the assignees of of the heirs of Isaac Todd and James McGill," reported the same back with an amendment, being a substitute for the bill.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with an amendment, House bill 619, for the relief of Asahel Lee, Harvey Lee, and Lemuel Lee.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Duncan L. Clinch; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. G. also reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, House bills for the relief of John Drysdale, and for the relief of Johnson Patrick.

Mr. MERRICK presented a communication from the Governor of Maryland, enclosing resolutions adopted by the Legislature of that State, relative to a proposed transfer of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, to the State of Maryland, on the condition that that State will complete the canal to Cumberland before the expiration of five years from the time of transfer: ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. PORTER presented a memorial from 142 citizens of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files the memorial and documents of John Goode.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the previous orders of the day were postponed, for the purpose of taking up, as in committee of the whole, the bill for the benefit of the Petersburg Railroad Company.

Mr. E. explained, that there were several cases before the Finance Committee in respect to an extension of the time during which railroad iron, to be actually laid down, might be imported free of duty. This was not one of those cases. All those cases now before the committee, were where railroads were in progress of construction, and where it would take some years for their completion; but the case now before the Senate differed in that respect: the railroad was completed, and the company were relaying a portion or all of it with new and better iron, in consequence of a portion of it being worn out. The iron was imported, and in the country. The company have it in their power to lay it all down before the 3d of March next, and entitle themselves to the benefits of the provision in the tariff bill allowing iron laid down before that time to be free of duty. They will lay it down by that time, unless Congress think fit to prolong the time for doing so. But, in order to have it done before the 3d of March, the company will have to employ a considerable number of persons more than they now have, and may probably have to suspend transportation and travel on the road until it is done. This, too, is the line on which the mail is conveyed. If you force the company to this, it will interrupt very much the Southern travelling; and the work would have to be done in a hurried manner, and might be consequently improperly done, and be the cause of accident hereafter. This bill involved none of the principle contained in the other cases before the committee, for the general admission of railroad iron free of duty for a longer period than the tariff of last session justified. The bill proposed to give this company till the 1st day of December next to lay down the rails, so that the work might go on gradually, and be well done.

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired what was the quantity of iron involved in the bill?

Mr. EVANS said, about 2,000 tons.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked whether the tariff law was to be repealed, because it did not suit the convenience of the company to comply with its provisions? This bill came up suddenly this morning, and he had not time to examine it. He had no objection to let it pass this stage; but, unless his present impressions were removed, it should not pass any other stage by his vote.

There being no proposition to amend the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. MOREHEAD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any letters or communications on file in the War Department relative to the granting by the British Government to the Hudson Bay Company, and by that company to individuals, of any portion of the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. MOREHEAD made some remarks on the importance of the resolutions, after the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] on yesterday, on a portion of a report made out by Mr. Greenhow, concerning the cessions by Great Britain to the Hudson Bay Company, of land in the Oregon Territory; after which, the resolution was adopted.

The following bills were then taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading, viz:

House bill (319) for the relief of Samuel Hambleton.

House bill (427) for the relief of the administrator of John Jackson.

House bill entitled "An act for the payment of seven companies of Georgia militia, for services rendered in the years 1840 and 1841," was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Messrs. KING and CALHOUN did not see the necessity for the passage of this act, inasmuch as they did not know the reason why these militia could not be paid under the existing general law, which provided that all militia called out by the Governors, and mustered into the service of the United States, should be paid, upon the muster-rolls showing the service being duly authenticated and presented at the War Department. If the service was actually performed, and the militia entitled to pay under the provisions of the existing law, but, owing to some informality could not receive it, they were willing to vote for a bill to authorize payment, notwithstanding such informality.

Mr. CRITTENDEN remarked that the Committee on Military Affairs were satisfied that these militia were entitled to pay; and reported back the bill for that purpose. They did not, however, inquire into the reason why the War Department had not allowed the pay under the existing law. He had no objections to let the bill be postponed until the exceptions taken by the War Department could be inquired into.

The bill was then, on the motion of Mr. KING, laid on the table until the inquiry could be made.

Mr. MOREHEAD presented the credentials of JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, esq., who was elected by the Legislature of Kentucky to be a Senator from that State in the Congress of the United States, for six years from and after the 4th day of March next.

THE EXCHEQUER BILL.

On motion by Mr. TALLMADGE, the bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department of the United States was taken up, and postponed till Wednesday next, and made the special order for that day; and Mr. T. expressed a hope that they would be able to give it consideration at that time.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from John Golden, of the city of New York—who represents that, in 1835, he received a patent, under the United States patent laws, for an invention of his to issue credit paper; and that he has the exclusive right to that kind of issue; and prays that authority be given him by Congress to issue an amount of credit checks, not exceeding $100,000, under the exchequer board, on his own name, in consideration of his yielding up to Congress his rights under his patented invention. This, being a subject of finance, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Copeland," was taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. CRITTENDEN made some remarks explanatory of its provisions, and said that the Judiciary Committee were of opinion that it should not pass. He moved that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. STURGEON made some remarks in favor of the passage of the bill.

The question was then put on the motion for indefinite postponement, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill to refund the balance due to Massachusetts for disbursements during the late war with Great Britain, came up in order, as in committee of the whole, on an adverse report of the Committee on Military Affairs; but was, on the motion of Mr. BATES, postponed till Tuesday next, and made the special order for that day.

The bill for the relief of William De Peyster and Henry N. Cruger was taken up as in committee of the whole; and, after a few remarks by Mr. CRITTENDEN, explanatory of its provisions, and there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SEVIER presented a memorial from the delegation in the House of Representatives from the Territories, soliciting the appointment of a standing committee by the Senate, to be called the Committee on Territories, to take charge of Territorial business; which being read, Mr. S. gave notice that he would on to-morrow morning introduce a resolution so to amend the rules of the Senate as to authorize the appointment of a standing committee of five, to take charge of Territorial business.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. presented to the Senate the credentials of GEORGE MCDUFFIE, E-q., who was elected by the Legislature of South Carolina a Senator from that State, in the Congress of the United States, for six years from and after the 4th of March next; which were read.

Senate bill entitled "An act to regulate enlistments in the army, and navy, and marine corps," came up in order as in committee of the whole.

Mr. BAYARD remarked that there was a proviso in the bill which provided that no negro or mulatto should be enlisted in the service of the United States, except in the capacity of musicians, cooks, or stewards. This provision (he said) was introduced into the bill at the last session, on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] after considerable discussion. The committee thought it better, therefore, to let it remain. It was his wish, however, that this proviso should be so modified, that, for temporary service in unhealthy climates, negroes or mulattoes may be treated as a part of the crew on board of those vessels in which they may be employed. On the coast of Africa and the Chinese Sea, it was extremely unhealthy; in consequence, they were compelled to employ natives of the country temporarily to do such duties as were required to be done on shore. It was not proposed to employ negroes in the service, in our own country—such was not the object of the amendment; but, as he said, its object was to authorize the temporary enlistment on foreign stations, and in unhealthy climates. If they were employed at all, it was necessary that they should be enlisted, that they might be subject to the rules and articles of war, and be entitled to receive their pay.

Mr. BENTON was understood to remark that this was the way the thing spreads. One of the requirements of the new British treaty was, that 80 guns should be kept on the coast of Africa. So, in order to carry out that treaty, it now becomes necessary to permit negroes and mulattoes to be enlisted in the service of the United States. He was against it altogether. He was opposed to the repeal of existing laws for any such purpose.

Mr. BAYARD thought the Senator was under a mistake in supposing there was any existing law which precluded negroes or mulattoes from being enlisted in the service of the United States. The superior courts had, indeed, decided that foreigners could not be enlisted; but there was not one word against negroes or mulattoes, until this identical bill was passed by the Senate last session, with the proviso suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] which limited the purposes for which they might be enlisted. Although this bill had passed the Senate, it was too late to meet the action of the other House, and it fell to the ground. On bringing it forward again, he had learned that the few amendments now offered would be necessary. It was the opinion of an experienced officer serving on a foreign station, that this amendment would place it in the power of the service to spare the lives of Americans, who could not stand the climate on land, at night, in the vicinity of the Chinese seas and other stations. At Ceylon, he was informed, a whole boat's crew might perish by being obliged to lie on shore one night; for such things had happened where boats were sent for water, and had to stay on shore for the night. Now this bill would enable our officers on such stations to employ, for temporary purposes, and for a limited time, the natives, who are accustomed to the climate, and can stand it.

The question was then put on the amendment, and disagreed to—ayes 14, noes 17.

Several verbal amendments were made, and the bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from a large number of persons, of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, praying for the immediate erection of a floating dock at the naval station at Brooklyn, on the plan of J. S. Gilbert: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, presented two memorials from the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, presented two memorials from the cities of New York and Brooklyn, in favor of the adoption of the plan for a board of exchequer recommended by the President: ordered to lie on the table.

Also, presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Apalachicola, Florida, asking an appropriation for establishing light-houses on Cape St. George and Cape San Blas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Mr. T. said that this memorial had been on his table for some time, but, in consequence of indisposition, he was unable to present it to the Senate.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial of a convention of delegates of the citizens of East Tennessee, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the Tennessee river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from Captain John Moore, praying the payment of his accounts as commissary of subsistence of certain Missouri militia; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, presented two memorials from the city of New York, signed by a number of persons, in which they say that it is their belief that the (so called) bankrupt law is unconstitutional and destructive of the rights of the creditor, and pray for its repeal: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, presented a memorial from a number of inhabitants of Platte county, Missouri, who were residents on a military reservation, complaining of the destruction of their property by a United States officer, in consequence of not obeying his order of removal from said reservation; and asking a settlement of their claims for the loss of this property, and for the loss of their land, which was covered by the reservation alluded to: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BENTON remarked that he had intended, on yesterday, to call the attention of the Senate to what he conceived to be another error in the printed speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] on the British treaty, in secret session; but the Senator was not then in his seat. It was his intention to do so to-day; but, as the morning hour had expired, he would not trespass on the time of the Senate, but would postpone doing so till to-morrow morning.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the augmentation of the marine corps; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. B. remarked that he had been directed, by the same committee, to report a bill which was connected with the great subject under discussion this morning—the improvement of harbors and rivers, to give facility to commerce. It was a bill for the survey and examination of the harbor of Memphis, Tennessee, with a view of establishing a navy-yard and naval depot at that place. He had been directed to report that bill back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. ARCHER presented a memorial from the heirs of Daniel Truehart, praying indemnity for property destroyed during the revolutionary war: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the resolutions adopted by the Senate, instructing that committee to inquire into the expediency of retaining the organization of the four companies of light artillery, and of repealing so much of the act of last session respecting the reorganization of the army, which provided that the second regiment of dragoons should be converted into a rifle regiment, reported a bill to repeal certain portions of the act entitled "An act respecting the organization of the army, and for other purposes," approved the 23d August, 1842; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the bill for the relief of Dr. Boyd Reilly.

Mr. CONRAD presented a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New Orleans, praying for the establishment of the warehousing system; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of the Board of Directors of the Petersburg Railroad Company, praying for an extension of the time for admitting railroad iron free of duty, reported a bill for the benefit of the Petersburg Railroad Company; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. EVANS, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the appointment of an assistant collector for the port of Bangor, in the collection district of Belfast, Maine; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, on the conditions therein expressed," approved June 15, 1836, made a report favorable to its passage; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, without amendment, House bill (212) entitled "An act authorizing sales of land, with the improvements thereon erected by the United States, for the use of their agents, teachers, farmers, mechanics, and other persons employed amongst the Indians."

Also reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Joseph Bryan, Harrison Young, and Benjamin Young.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, House bill (462) for the relief of John Hicks; and House bill (289) for the relief of John Javins.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK,

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to communicate to the Senate a statement showing the number of existing contracts with railroad companies for the transportation of the mail, and the price established to be paid for said service, under each contract; and also the amount paid for the transportation of the mail over each of said routes the year previous to the contract with the respective railroad companies.

The following engrossed bills were then read the third time and passed, viz:

The bill authorizing a settlement of the accounts of Joseph Nourse.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Dyson;" and

The bill entitled "An act to revive the act for the relief of Mary Tucker."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, a statement of the imports and exports of gold and silver coin and bullion since 1834; which, on motion of Mr. BENTON, was ordered to be printed. Then,

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 17, 1843.

Mr. A. C. DODGE, of Iowa, presented a memorial from citizens of the city of Burlington, Iowa, representing that the commerce and business of said city, together with that of the flourishing and thrifty towns of Bloomington, Davenport, Rock Island, Galena, Dubuque, and Prairie du Chien, and the country around them on either side of the river, embracing the finest portions of the State of Illinois and the Territories of Iowa and Wisconsin, is subjected to a most burdensome tax in the increased price of freights, occasioned by the obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi river at the Des Moines, or Lower Rapids, and earnestly urging on Congress the great importance of making an appropriation to remove said obstructions: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GREEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill appropriating $200,000 per year, commencing the present year, and to be continued for the ensuing ten years, to be applied to the removal of the obstructions in the Western waters, and be under the control of the Secretary of War; and report to this House with the most convenient despatch.

Mr. FILLMORE said that he was about to report a bill on the subject contained in the resolution.

Mr. GREEN proposed that the House should adopt his resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution adopted.

Mr. H. DODGE introduced "A bill for the protection of commerce on the western shores of Lake Michigan."

Twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EVERETT moved the printing of the substitute for the exchequer plan now in Committee of the Whole.

The motion was adopted.

The committees were then called on for reports.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers, and for continuing the Cumberland road, for the half calendar year ending June 30, 1843, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1844.

The bill was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PICKENS, from the same committee, reported a bill to extend the time for laying down iron actually imported for railroad companies. Mr. P. suggested that it would not be necessary to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole. He therefore moved that the bill be printed, and that it lie on the Speaker's table: agreed to.

CLERK IN THE SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a joint resolution for the continuation of an additional clerk in the Second Auditor's Office; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COWEN reported a resolution that the House shall meet, on Friday and Saturday next, at 10 o'clock, for the transaction of private business.

Mr. C. moved the previous question on the adoption of the resolution; but the House refused to second it.

Mr. TURNEY moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COWEN asked for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The House refused to order them.

The motion to lay on the table was then adopted without a division.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY presented a petition from Baltimore against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which, he said, was numerously signed by men of both parties.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported Senate bill 39, (proposing certain amendments to the bill for the establishment of additional mail routes, passed August, 1842,) with the unanimous recommendation that it be rejected. The bill and report of the committee were ordered to lie on the table.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following bill:

A BILL to repeal the bankrupt law.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved on the 19th day of August, 1841, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Provided, however, That the repeal shall not extend to or affect any case which, at the time this act goes into effect, shall be pending before any court; nor to any proceeding which, at said time, shall have been legally commenced, and which shall be then in progress, under and by virtue of the said act hereby repealed.

The bill was read a first time.

Mr. BARNARD objected to its second reading, which he said he could do under the rule, which forbade the second reading of a bill on the same day it was reported, unless no objection was made.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that the second reading of the bill having been objected to, the question would come up before the House, Shall this bill be rejected?

Mr. BARNARD repeated his objection, and insisted on his right to make it.

Mr. CLIFFORD remarked that the parliamentary law was imperative in requiring the question to be taken on the rejection of the bill, after the objection made to its second reading by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD.]

The SPEAKER said that, by reference to the 109th rule of the House, he found that, if objection was made to the first reading of the bill, the question would then ensue upon its rejection. By that rule, no bill could have its first and second reading on the same day, without a special order from the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON. Let us make it the special order now.

Mr. BARNARD said he claimed the floor to make another report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MOORE suggested that the second reading of the bill be fixed for to-morrow.

Mr. BARNARD persisted in his point of order, and his right to the floor.

Mr. ATHERTON observed, that the bill had been read the first time; and it was not necessary for it to be read a second time, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] should make the motion. He (Mr. A.) would now make the motion that the bill be read the second time.

Mr. BARNARD said that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] was not entitled to the floor to make the motion.

Mr. ATHERTON said that the bill was not disposed of; it was under consideration; and, the gentleman having reported it, and refused to move its second reading, or its reference, he had no right to the floor for any other purpose.

Mr. BARNARD insisted upon it that the bill was not before the House. He had the floor, and no person had a right to make the motion but himself.

Mr. BRIGGS understood that the gentleman claimed the floor for another subject.

Mr. ROOSEVELT asked if it was not now in order to move to amend the bill?

After some further conversation—

The SPEAKER said that he was clearly of opinion that the House had the right to order the bill to be read a second time now.

Mr. BARNARD then observed that, after that decision of the Chair, he should no longer object to the second reading.

The bill was then read the second time; when

Mr. TURNEY rose, and said that he wished to offer an amendment to the bill; but,

Mr. BARNARD rising, the Speaker awarded the floor to that gentleman.

Mr. B. then, under instructions from the Committee on the Judiciary, moved to recommit the bill to that committee, with instructions to report amendments to the following effect:

"1st. Confining the repeal to that part of the bankrupt law which authorizes proceedings in bankruptcy on the sole petition and motion of the bankrupt.

"2d. Authorizing any bankrupt to declare himself insolvent, and making such declaration an act of bankruptcy upon which his creditors may proceed against him in bankruptcy.

"3d. Authorizing the creditors, or a majority of them in amount, to nominate the assignee of the bankrupt's estate.

"4th. Providing that the assent of a majority in amount of the creditors shall be necessary to a discharge."

Mr. TURNEY rose to a question of order. The Speaker, he understood, gave the floor to the gentleman from New York, as a matter of courtesy to the reporter of a bill. Now, he contended that he, having risen and claimed the floor before the gentleman, was entitled to it. The gentleman from New York, he added, had forfeited his right by courtesy, because, after reporting the bill, he had objected to its second reading, and refused to make a motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole, in accordance with the universal practice.

The CHAIR said that the member from New York was entitled to the preference given him, according to the universal practice of the House. No member had ever interposed between the reporter of a bill and any motion he might wish to make in regard to it.

Mr. TURNEY contended that the present case was entirely different from the usual practice of the House; for here the reporter of the bill objected to its second reading, and refused to make any motion to facilitate its progress.

The SPEAKER persisting in his decision,

Mr. TURNEY appealed, and addressed the House in favor of the appeal.

Mr. BARNARD was so unfortunate as to differ with the gentleman from Tennessee in regard to the facts of the case. According to his recollection, he addressed the Chair before the second reading of the bill; and after it was read the sec time, he again addressed the Chair first.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON desired to say that his colleague [Mr. TURNEY] was correct as to the facts stated by him. After the bill was read the second time, his colleague got up first, and addressed the Chair. This fact was within the recollection of several members. The Speaker, he understood, gave the floor to the gentleman from New York, on the ground of courtesy to the introducer of a bill; but it must be observed that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] got the floor between the introduction of the bill and its second reading, and that it was upon his motion that it was read the second time.

Mr. HOUSTON desired to ask the Chair whether it would now be in order to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER answered in the negative.

Mr. HOPKINS hoped the gentleman from Tennessee would withdraw the appeal. The Chair, in his opinion, had an arbitrary and unqualified right, under the parliamentary law, of awarding the floor to either of the members who may rise at the same time. Besides, the object that both he and the gentleman from Tennessee had in view, would not be promoted by persisting in the appeal. But for the appeal, a motion to amend would be in order, and a motion to commit also. He only asked the gentleman to withdraw his appeal, and he would make a motion to strike out the proviso.

The SPEAKER said that he would not go into an issue with the gentleman from Tennessee upon his statement of facts, because the Chair did not decide upon the facts he stated. The Chair decided upon the uniform practice and courtesy of the House to the reporter of a bill. The second reading occurred not upon the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, (who was not entitled to the floor to make it,) but as the necessary course of the bill upon the withdrawal of the objections of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD.] Had the gentleman persisted in his objections, the question would have been, not upon the second reading, but upon the rejection of the bill.

Mr. CLIFFORD asked if an amendment striking out the proviso of the bill would be in order, if the appeal were withdrawn.

The SPEAKER said that it would not.

Mr. CLIFFORD then addressed the House in favor of the appeal, contending that, upon the grounds stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. TURNEY,] the Speaker ought to have given him the floor, instead of the gentleman from New York. The object of the gentleman from New York, as was apparent to every one, was to defeat the bill. He therefore hoped that all who were in favor of the repeal would vote to reverse the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BRIGGS exclaimed against the appeal of the gentleman from Maine to the House, to vote against the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLIFFORD. Because it is wrong.

Mr. BRIGGS (without noticing the explanation) said, if the Speaker was right, it was the duty of the House to sustain him; but the course pointed out by the gentleman from Maine, who was himself a lawyer, would give a blow at parliamentary rule, with a vengeance; for it was an appeal to vote against the decision of the Chair, right or wrong. He made some further remarks which were not distinctly heard.

Mr. WISE said there was no principle involved, except as to who was entitled to the floor; and he added that he believed the Speaker had absolute power on that point.

The SPEAKER then put the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" which was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. WISE then asked what would be the effect of the previous question.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that it would bring the House to a vote on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. WISE inquired whether it would cut off the proviso.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

Mr. WISE. Then I move the previous question. I am in favor of the proviso. [Great excitement.]

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, if this motion ——

Mr. WISE (amidst much confusion) Mr. Speaker, is this in order?

The SPEAKER replied, but his voice was overpowered by the hum of excited conversation throughout the hall.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I cannot hear a word. [Great confusion.]

Mr. BARNARD. If this motion had been made in the ordinary way ——

Mr. WISE again interposed, and exclaimed that he could not hear a word that was said.

The SPEAKER called the House to order.

Mr. BARNARD then resumed, and said if this motion had been made in the ordinary way, on the commitment of the bill, and the previous question was sustained, he was aware it would bring the House directly to a vote on the main proposition; but the Speaker would remember that the motion was not made by him as an individual member of the House, but as the organ of the Judiciary Committee, and in the form and shape of a report from that committee; and in such a case, he submitted, the rule did not apply; and that if the previous question was seconded, the vote must first be taken on the report of the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER'S reply did not reach the reporter's desk.

Mr. BARNARD inquired whether the House could cut off the report of a committee.

The SPEAKER replied that it was for a majority of the House to determine.

Mr. WISE asked the Clerk to read the bill as it would stand if the previous question was seconded.

The Clerk read the bill, as submitted yesterday by Mr. CLIFFORD, simply repealing the bankrupt law, with the proviso submitted by Mr. TILLINGHAST.

Mr. WISE. I stick to the previous question.

The Speaker put the question on seconding the demand for the previous question, but he was unable to decide. Tellers were then demanded, and Messrs. WELLER and BRIGGS were appointed; and having taken the vote, they reported 92 in the affirmative, and 83 in the negative. There was, therefore, a second.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired? (It was 10 minutes past 1.)

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BARNARD. Then I call for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER. The order of the day is the further consideration of the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law. [Roars of laughter.]

[This bill, which was now the order of the day, was the bill some time since introduced by Mr. EVERETT, to which various amendments had been offered, and on which Mr. MARSHALL was entitled to the floor from the middle of last week.]

Mr. CUSHING rose and said Mr. KENNEDY'S bill to regulate the mode of measuring the tonnage of vessels had been made the special order for this day.

Mr. WISE inquired if the previous question had not been seconded on the bill which the Judiciary Committee, by direction of the House, had reported.

The SPEAKER said it had, and it would be the order of the day for the morning hour to morrow.

Mr. WISE. [Laughing.] Well, "take your time, Miss Lucy." [Laughter.]

Some conversation ensued respecting the bill which Mr. CUSHING contended was the special order for this day; but

The SPEAKER announced the order of the day to be Mr. EVERETT'S bill to repeal the bankrupt law, on which the gentleman from Kentucky was entitled to the floor.

And the state of the question was this:

Mr. BARNARD had moved the following amendment to (or substitute for) the original bill:

"That so much of the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved on the 19th of August, 1841, as authorizes any person owing debts to apply by petition, for the benefit of said act, together with all the parts of said act which are applicable solely to the mode of obtaining the benefit of the provisions of such act, in behalf of debtors, by the voluntary petition of such debtors, without the concurrence or aid of their creditors be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy already commenced, or which shall be commenced before the 4th day of July next, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures, prescribed and incurred, or which shall be incurred, under said act."

And Mr. CUSHING had offered the following amendment to the original bill:

"In the proviso of the original bill, strike out the '5th day of December, 1842,' &c., and insert so that the proviso shall read as follows. 'Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures incurred under the said act; but every such proceeding may be continued to its final consummation, in like manner as if this act had not been passed."

Mr. BRIGGS had moved that the bill be committed to the Committee on on the Judiciary, with the following instructions:

"To report a bill to repeal that part of the existing law which authorises the voluntary application of debtors, and to include corporations which issue paper to circulate as money within the operations of said law."

Which proposed instructions Mr. C. JOHNSON had moved to amend, so as to instruct the committee to report a bill for the immediate repeal of the bankrupt law, without limit or qualifications; (simply, in fact, striking out the proviso of the original bill of Mr. EVERETT.)

Mr. MARSHALL rose and said he would not be responsible for any delay of the action of this House on the subject of the bankrupt law; but he wished to inquire what would be the effect on himself, if he moved the previous question, and it should not be sustained by the House—whether he should retain the right to the floor. He did not wish to take the responsibility of any delay in the action of the House; but he did not wish to forfeit his right to the floor, if the House should refuse to second his motion.

The SPEAKER replied that, if the previous question was voted down, the gentleman from Kentucky would not be absolutely entitled to the floor, though, no doubt, he would obtain it by courtesy.

Mr. MARSHALL said, then, for the second or third time, he put himself on the courtesy of the House, and he moved the previous question.

Mr. GRANGER said, if the previous question was not sustained, he should certainly object to the gentleman from Kentucky having the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. But if I get it, the gentleman from New York cannot prevent my speaking.

Mr. GRANGER said, warmly, the gentleman from Kentucky had spoken once.

Mr. MARSHALL contradicted the assertion of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER also said that the gentleman from Kentucky had not spoken on this question.

Mr. MARSHALL again moved the previous question.

Mr. CUSHING protested against the motion for the previous question. He said several gentlemen had entered into a very general debate, which had been continued for several days while this bill was before the House, and he protested against being thus cut off from a reply. If, however, he could get the floor, if the House should negative the previous question, he should claim and retain it, courtesy or no courtesy.

Mr. MARSHALL said there was not a gentleman on that floor more anxious to discuss the question than he was.

(Cries of "Go on, then.")

Mr. WISE inquired, if the previous question was sustained, and the main question was ordered to be put, and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] should be adopted, whether the bill would not then be, in substance, the same as the bill to be acted upon to-morrow morning?

Mr. CUSHING. Precisely.

Some conversation ensued as to the priority of the amendments; and

Tellers were demanded on seconding the motion for the previous question. Messrs. BRIGGS and READ were appointed; and they reported 110 in the affirmative, and 28 in the negative; there was, therefore, a second.

The effect of sustaining the previous question was to cut off the several motions to commit with instructions, and to bring the House to a vote upon the amendments to the bill.

The question recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.]

Mr. SMITH of Virginia called for its reading; and it was read.

Mr. S. expressed a desire to move an amendment to the amendment; but the motion was ruled out of order.

The amendment was then adopted—yeas 148, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landeff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. The question next came up upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD.]

Mr. MOORE asked for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The amendment was then rejected—yeas 73, nays 136, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Boardman, Borden, Briggs, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Wm. B. Calhoun, Childs, J. C. Clark, Staley N. The SPEAKER announced the question to be upon the engrossment of the bill; and it was ordered to be engrossed.

The CHAIR. When shall the bill have its third reading?

Many members. "Now."

Mr. ARNOLD rose and objected, upon the ground that the bill was not yet engrossed.

The SPEAKER said that the bill must go over until to morrow, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the bill be read again to-day.

The SPEAKER said that the bill not being engrossed, that could not be done but by general consent.

Mr. HOPKINS said that it could be done by order of the House.

Mr. EVERETT moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. WISE inquired what would be the effect if the bill should be brought in engrossed in an hour's time? Could it not be read the third time then? It was useless for gentlemen to persist in this kind of opposition, where there was so large a majority in favor of the repeal. It would be better to let the bill be read the third time now, and passed, and be done with it.

The question was then put on the suspension of the rules—and decided in the affirmative, ayes 143, noes 28.

Mr. GRANGER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which being ordered,

It was read the third time and passed—yeas 140, nays 71, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arrington, Atherton, Baker, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Black, Boardman, Botts, Brodhead, Bond, Brewster, Brinson, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, W. Butler, W. O. So the bill was passed in the following form:

AN ACT to repeal the Bankrupt Act.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved 19th August, 1841, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures incurred under the said act; but every such proceeding may be continued to its final consummation, in like manner as if this act had not been passed.

[Mr. M. A. COOPER desired to move to be excused from voting; but the Speaker decided that the motion came too late, as the first two names on the roll had already been called.]

Mr. MARK A. COOPER asked to be excused from voting on the bill for the following reasons:

He is desirous to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law, as a true representative of his constituents' opinions, as well as of his own.

The friends of this bill have incorporated into it a proviso, which sanctions all the principles of the bankrupt law; principles which he thinks unconstitutional and unjust, as well as immoral in their effects, and ought not to receive his support. He cannot, therefore, vote for the bill. It it were a mere question of time, he could vote; but that is not the case.

Again: being in favor of the repeal, he cannot vote against the bill; a part of which proposes a repeal of the bankrupt act; because that would be to sanction the existence and operation of the act for an indefinite period.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia in the chair.)

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the committee take up House bill No. 645, being a bill making appropriations for the army, &c.

The motion was agreed to; and the Clerk read the bill through all its sections. It was then read section by section for amendment, and the House passed several without objection. When the item was under consideration which appropriates $90,000 for arsenals—

Mr. DEBERRY moved to strike out $90,000, and insert $110,000, with the specific direction that $90,000 of that sum should be appropriated for the completion of the arsenal at Fayetteville, North Carolina. He went into some statements to show the importance of that arsenal, and the action which had been had in relation thereto by the Legislature of North Carolina; whence instructions had been received by the Senators for that State, and a request by its members in the House of Representatives, that they would give their aid in procuring the necessary appropriations for the completion of that work. It had been going on for several years, but the appropriation hitherto had been too small to enable the Government to complete it; and he now moved his amendment in conformity with the wishes of his State Legislature and of his immediate constituents, amongst whom this arsenal was situated.

Mr. FILLMORE said if the arsenal was in the course of construction, it was provided for by the present appropriation, for the department asked for sums sufficient to carry on all works that were deemed essential; and if this work was not embraced in the detailed statement from the department, he supposed it was not deemed necessary. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no particular designation of arsenals in this bill. The Committee of Ways and Means had recommended all the appropriations asked for by the department; and he trusted, in the present embarrassed state of the treasury, they should not go beyond the estimates.

Mr. McKAY said if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would examine the detailed estimates, he would find that it was not intended to expend any portion of this money on the arsenal in question; the amendment of his colleague was, therefore, a proper one. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had said that it was unnecessary to specify any particular works; but if that gentleman would look at previous acts of Congress, he would find that it had been frequently done; and there was no reason why it should not be done in this case, as the works had been begun, and no appropriation was proposed for their completion.

Mr. FILLMORE replied.

The committee then rose and reported progress.

Mr. PROFFIT moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill to repeal the bankrupt act had been passed.

Mr. CUSHING obtained the floor on the question of reconsideration, and then moved an adjournment.

Mr. FILLMORE requested the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw that motion, that the House might receive some Executive communications which were on the Speaker's table.

Mr. CUSHING consented to do so, with the understanding that he retained the floor on the question of reconsideration when it should come up.

The SPEAKER then presented various Executive communications, mainly consisting of information called for by resolutions of the House. One was a report of the inspectors of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia. Another was a communication from the War Department, in answer to a resolution of the 27th ultimo, requiring a detailed statement of all the expenditures from the Chickasaw fund. Another was a communication in answer to a resolution calling for certified copies of all papers on file relating to the arrest and trial of Louallier by a court-martial, by direction of General Jackson, at New Orleans, in 1815.

Mr. KING of Georgia presented a petition from sundry citizens of Baltimore, praying for the establishment of a steamboat communication between that port and Chagres, South America; which was referred to the Select Committee heretofore appointed on that subject.

On motion of Mr. TURNEY, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 18, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of Congress of 1808 and 1809, statements of all the contracts made by the bureaus under the direction of that department, in the year 1842; which, on motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, was laid on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from the city of New York, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WOODBURY presented a memorial signed by J. Bagby, praying that the bankrupt law may be so modified as to give mechanics a lien on work executed by them; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE presented a petition from William Morrow, praying remuneration in consequence of violations by United States agents of a contract for executing certain works at the United States arsenal in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from citizens of the southern part of Missouri, praying for the removal of the land office from Jackson to Fredericktown, in that State: referred to the Conimittee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, on leave, introduced a bill to apply certain alternate sections of the public domain towards completing works of internal improvement in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Mr. Downing, for reimbursement of money paid by him for clerk-hire in his office as register of a land office; and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill for repaving and repairing a portion of Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Printing, to whom the subject had been referred, made a report (which was concurred in) in favor of printing the communication from the Solicitor of the Treasury in relation to the cloth cases, in which frauds were attempted on the revenue.

Mr. WOODBURY stated that, as the subject of resolutions was now before the Senate, he felt obliged to make a remark as to one introduced at the last session by his former colleague.

Mr. W. regretted that the resolution had not yet been answered. Some of the information desired in it related to the persons and matters connected with the cloth cases, on which a report had just been ordered to be printed. Other reports, containing letters and documents on this topic, and the conduct of those concerned in it, had been printed by Congress at the last session, and distributed widely abroad as well as in this country.

It was due to all concerned that the answer to the call made in the resolution of my late colleague, should go to the world with the other papers bearing on this question. It was supposed to be calculated to throw much light on the whole subject.

The answer may have been delayed or omitted by accident. If so, this notice would revive attention to it in the proper quarter, and would save the introduction of any other resolution asking for the reasons which had prevented a reply hitherto.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the State Department, transmiting in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, further information received at that department concerning the operations of the bankrupt law; which, on motion of Mr. BATES, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmiting, in compliance with the act of Congress of 1804, a report of the names, dates of appointment, and pay of all persons employed in the Indian Department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, referred back, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of the representatives of Baron De Kalb.

THE RED LINES AGAIN.

Mr. BENTON (after some prefatory remarks, to the effect that he had waited for some days till the Senator from Virginia, who had been absent, resumed his seat, for an opportunity to recall that Senator's attention to the error in his printed speech on the subject of the treaty, yet uncorrected,) said, yesterday he was about to do so, when the morning hour expired; and he postponed the subject on that account till now. The error of which he complained was in these words of the Senator's printed speech:

"The Senator who produced it [the map] could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line, indicating the limits of the United States according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding minutely and exactly with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks."

This error was not only printed in the Senator's speech, but repriated in the speech of the Senator from South Carolina; and arguments were based upon it, as if it was a matter of fact. His object now was, to appeal to the Chair for its decision as to the facts of this statement. I ask you, Mr. President, (continued Mr. BENTON,) whether the extract I have just read is correct or not, and whether I was not the first to proclaim the "strong red line," before "other eyes" were required to point it out?

The CHAIR made some remarks not distinctly heard, but it was understood to import an impression that it could hardly be in order to make any statement, unless required by the Senate in regular debate.

Mr. BENTON was understood to say that he did not mean to press an interrogatory out of order.

Mr. BARROW remarked that it seemed to him that the presiding officer of the Senate should not be called upon to state his recollection of facts which were personal to Senators, and about which there was a controversy between two Senators. It was deeply to be regretted that there was any such misunderstanding between Senators as to matters of fact. This subject had been before the Senate twice, and, as he conceived, improperly; and it was now before it again, which rendered it more so. It was more than probable that, if the discussion went on to-day, it would devolve on the Chair to put an end to it; he would therefore be placed in an awkward predicament, if he should be compelled to put an end to a controversy in which, upon the call of a Senator, he had become, on its very threshold, a witness. He merely threw out the suggestion, of which he hoped the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] would perceive the propriety. If the memory of the presiding officer was fresh and fixed as regarded facts of a public character, there would be no impropriety in Senators calling upon him for his recollection of them; but there was certainly an impropriety in pursuing such a course in this case, (when his memory of the transaction must be imperfect,) which was more of a personal than a public nature. The Senator from Missouri had a right to call upon any Senator to give to the Senate his recollection of the facts; but not upon the Chair. He therefore suggested to him, whether his own good sense did not perceive there was an impropriety, under the circumstances, in calling upon the presiding officer to become a witness. There were Senators who had a recollection of this transaction, as well as the presiding officer; their memory was as perfect as his: he suggested, then, whether, under the circumstances of the case, the Senator from Missouri should press this point.

The CHAIR remarked that, if it was the sense of the Senate, he would state his recollection of the transaction. His memory was not as full and exact as he could desire; but, having been called upon most unexpectedly, and having held no conversations upon the subject, within his recollection, he felt some delicacy in making any statement.

Mr. BENTON was understood to remark that there could be no want of delicacy in the presiding officer, before whom the transaction occurred, stating his recollection of the fact.

The CHAIR said he was taken by surprise, but he would put it to the sense of the Senate whether he might be permitted to make a statement. The question was then put to the Senate, and decided in the negative.

Mr. BENTON then called upon the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BARROW] to state to the Senate his recollection of the transaction in controversy.

Mr. BARROW then rose, and said that, if he had any distinct recollection of the transaction, he would tell it to the Senate; but, since the matter was first introduced, he had endeavored, for the last two days, to refresh his memory, with a desire to put the matter, so far as he could, on a proper footing. But his recollection was so indistinct, that he would not undertake to state anything positive. He took very little interest in the discussion which sprung up when the map was presented by the Senator from Missouri. He felt very little interest as regarded these lines, and never perused the map when in the possession of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON;] nor afterwards, when it was sent to the seat of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] did he attend there, for the purpose of examining it, as others did. He would state the impression made on his mind on that day; premising that he did not pretend to know anything with certainty in reference to the matter in dispute, as to these lines, at that time. Occupying a seat there [pointing to the seat] when the debate sprung up, he paid no particular attention to what was said by any Senator, for he felt that it was of more importance that the discussion should be interrupted. Having made up his own mind how he should give his vote, he did not feel it incumbent on him to listen. His attention was not therefore attracted to the debate, until struck with the solemn manner in which the Senator from Virginia had introduced the map. This was his impression—whether on sufficient grounds, or not, he would not undertake to say. The map was introduced by the Senator from Missouri. What he said when he called the attention of the Senate to it, and the lines upon it, he did not remember. When the map was transferred to the seat of the Senator from Virginia, there was a collection of about a dozen Senators around it. He never pretended at all to go there. He had no curiosity about it. But the impression made on his mind was, that the map was introduced by the Senator from Missouri, to rebut or destroy the effect (as he understood it) of the map of Mr. Sparks; but that it did not sustain the honorable Senator from Missouri in his position before the examination of the map took place at the seat of the Senator from Virginia. That seemed to be the impression made on the Senate; but whether it was well-grounded or not, he would not undertake to say. He repeated, that he paid no particular attention to what took place when the map was introduced. The Senator from Missouri introduced the map, he had no doubt, for the purpose that he had stated; and he had no doubt, also, that he made the remarks he said he did make when he introduced it. He entertained no doubt on his part at all; but he must say that his recollection was not sufficiently accurate to testify to the facts as they occurred.

Mr. BENTON observed that it was an issue of fact; and, that there could be no mistake, he would read the passage of the Senator's printed speech over again:

"The Senator who produced it [the map] could see nothing but the microscopic dotted line running off in a northeasterly direction; but the moment other eyes were applied to it, there was found, in bold relief, a strong red line indicating the limits of the United States, according to the treaty of peace, and coinciding minutely and exactly with the boundary traced on the map of Mr. Sparks."

Here a thing was stated as a fact, which he (Mr. B.) denied in every particular. And, in contravention of what is therein stated, he asserted that he did see something besides the "microscopic dotted line;" that he not only saw the "strong red line," but that he was the first to proclaim it, to show that Mr. Sparks's discovery was no secret at all. He would now ask his colleague [Mr. LINN] for his recollection of what occurred.

Mr. LINN stated that when the Senator from Virginia introduced Mr. Sparks's map, the impression on his mind was, that there was more importance attached to it than it merited. Indeed, he thought it of so little consequence, that he could recollect he so expressed himself to the Senator from Pennsylvania next to him [Mr. BUCHANAN] at the time; and observed to him that the map ought not to have been introduced in the debate, as the question would not turn on that point then; for it had been settled by our forefathers, that the boundary claimed by Maine was the one intended; but if we were going to make a sacrifice for the sake of peace, we ought to do it frankly. While he (Mr. L.) was conversing on this point with the Senator from Pennsylvania, his colleague [Mr. BENTON] raised his voice and cried out, "Here are the bloody lines—the red lines;" and he went on to remark that it was no secret at all, because it was in Mr. Jefferson's collection of maps and books, and had been for years open to the inspection of every one in the Library of Congress. And what brought it more distinctly to his recollection, was his colleague's remark—that it came from the collection of one distinguished for his care in collecting and keeping everything that was of interest to his country—Mr. Jefferson. He (Mr. L.) had discharged his mind of all impressions about the introduction of Mr. Sparks's map, because he never attached any importance to the sort of evidence it could furnish; nor, indeed, to the point made upon it. And with regard to the object for which his colleague introduced Mr. Jefferson's map, his impression was, that it was to prove there was no secret; but beyond that object, he did not recollect any other, unless it was to prove that there should be no importance whatever attached to Mr. Sparks's map. His impression was, indeed, that his colleague had no other object in view, when he brought forward his map. He wished to show that we had, for years, had just such a map in our own archives, open to public inspection.

Mr. ARCHER said he earnestly hoped that the matter would be allowed to stop here. He was convinced there had been nothing but a diversity of sentiment, reflecting in no degree on either Senator; and he could see no reason, therefore, for so much sensitiveness on the part of the Senator from Missouri. He hoped that, in this view of the matter, which he believed was concurred in by Senators on all sides, the subject would be allowed to drop. It was rare, indeed, that all the minute transactions of but a few weeks gone by, were retained distinctly in the recollection of gentlemen. This was his own case in the present instance. He had not the smallest recollection of the particulars which had been alluded to, or he would have interposed and endeavored to terminate the controversy. As it evidently appeared to be a mere difference of impression on the part of the honorable Senators, he hoped the question would be allowed to rest, without any further debate.

Mr. CALHOUN said, as allusion had been made to him, he deemed it proper to state what his recollection was of the facts, as far as he himself was concerned. His impression at the time was, that the map from the library was produced by the Senator from Missouri for the purpose of rebutting and invalidating the one in the possession of the gentleman from Virginia. His impression was, further, that when the map was being unfolded by the Senator from Missouri, and his eye caught the dotted line, he called the attention of the Senate to it, as being the true boundary line, and as differing from the line described in Mr. Sparks's map, inasmuch as it ran in a more northerly direction. This was his impression, though he might have been in error. He had himself supposed that the red marks delineated the boundaries of counties, or of States; but he found afterwards that this supposition was wrong. And the general impression resting upon his mind was, that the map produced by the Senator from Missouri did not sustain him in what he (Mr. CALHOUN) believed to be his object, viz: in rebutting the other map.

These were the impressions he entertained at the time, and they had not been changed since. He would take this occasion to remark, that he hoped another debate in secret session would never be published. He thought the precedent was going to be highly pernicious; it would probably operate as a restriction upon the liberty of debate. He had written out his own speech reluctantly, and only with a view, as other speeches were being published, of putting himself right; and in writing that speech, he had taken the general run of the facts, without entering into the minute details, which, in a case like that, could have but little influence upon the public mind.

Mr. BENTON reiterated that, in the presence of forty-eight Senators, (most of whom were present on the occasion,) he was the first himself to proclaim the red line. He not only could see them, contrary to the words he had quoted; but he did not, as they assert, leave it to "other eyes" to be applied to the map to discover them. He proclaimed them aloud from his seat. This was the issue of fact. And on it he appealed to the Senators around him for their recollections.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut observed that, according to his recollection, when the Senator from Missouri heard of Sparks's map, he raised the map in his own hands, and exclaimed, "here are the bloody red lines." The words were so remarkable, that they made a strong impression on his mind.

Mr. BENTON asked if he had any recollection of allusion being made to the "secret?"

Mr. SMITH replied that his recollection was rather indistinct about that; but still his impression was, that it must have been to show there was no secret about it.

Mr. ALLEN observed that this was (to say the least of it) a very troublesome dispute, growing out of a deeply exciting discussion which had taken place with closed doors, and in consequence of the additional circumstance that the matter had not been noticed at the time by any reporter. His impression was, that there was no real difference between the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Missouri. The difference was barely as to the form of the question now made—the one adhering to the object for which the map was introduced, and the other to the fact of the announcement of the broad red line which was visible to every one. Believing, then, that there was nothing substantial involved in the controversy, he must be permitted to express his regret that the matter should be deemed sufficiently important to occupy the attention of the Senate.

He had hitherto remained quiet, and volunteered no opinion nor expression of his impressions upon the subject; but, being now particularly called upon, he could state very readily what those impressions were; and he did so with a perfect conviction that the statement could not reflect in the least degree on any member of that body, in one way or the other. His attention was attracted to the fact of the introduction of the map by the Senator from Virginia, by the solemnity with which it was introduced; the Senator evidently regarding it as a matter of peculiar importance, and calling the attention of the Senate very pointedly to the map.

While this part of the discussion was going on, the Senator from Missouri (according to his recollection of the case) obtained an old atlas, and spreading open a map, exclaimed, "here is the red line." As to the motive with which the Senator from Missouri introduced the atlas, his recollection was not very distinct; but the circumstance of the red line having been pointed out by him he (Mr. A.) particularly remembered, in consequence of the manner in which the Senator had called attention to it, being devoid of that deference or courtesy which he (Mr. A.) conceived was due to the gentleman who had possession of the floor. As to the fact of the announcement of the red line, he recollected distinctly that the Senator from Missouri made use of the word "bloody." He might not perhaps have recollected the circumstance, but for the phrase made use of by the Senator; which, of itself, was calculated to make an impression upon the memory. He repeated, that he did not conceive that this statement could affect either Senator, one way or the other; for he did not conceive that there was any essential difference between the Senators—the one contending as to the object for which the map was produced, and the failure of that object; and the other as to the announcement of the broad red line.

Mr. RIVES begged leave to say that he did not think it at all necessary to enter into the discussion of the matter with any spirit of controversy, but——

The CHAIR here interrupted the Senator from Virginia, with a request that he might be permitted to explain the preceding remarks he had made. The Chair then stated that his recollection was refreshed by the remarks which had fallen from the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN.] They reminded him that he had held a conversation with him, and in which conversation that Senator accorded with his recollection, that there was no substantial difference between the two Senators. The Chair superadded the remark, that if it was the sense of the Senate, he would add that no issue was made up on the fact of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] having announced the red lines. That, on a previous occasion, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] had remarked that he could not have fallen into the absurdity of imputing the design to the Senator from Missouri, of an intended suppression of the red line, with the view to impose upon the Senate or the country. That the recollection of the Chair was, that the red line was announced; but the ground of his supposition, that there was no substantial difference between the Senators, was, that the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, complained of, were not literal and exact, but only figurative. They had been so regarded by the Chair. And if the Chair might use the expression, he had understood the expression of the Senator from Virginia to mean, that the mind's eye of the Senator from Missouri was so engrossed with the microscopic dotted line, that he gave none, or scarcely any, consideration to the plain or palpable red line; and that his opinion on this point was much fortified by the statement made by the Senator from Virginia on a previous occasion, that he could not, or did not, design the absurdity of attempting to produce the impression, either upon the Senate or the public mind, that the Senator from Missouri attempted to exhibit the dotted line, and at the same time to suppress or conceal the existence of the red line, which was bold and strongly marked on the same map.

Mr. RIVES said he desired to say a word or two, for the purpose of placing the matter in its true attitude before the public, though he doubted whether the public were disposed to take any interest in the matter at all. He concurred entirely in the very candid and sober view of the matter which had been presented by the Chair, and by the Senator from Ohio, with regard to the red line and the dotted line. The whole difference between the Senator from Missouri and himself, reduced itself to a mere matter of opinion, as had been very justly remarked. He would state, most distinctly, that his own impression in regard to the expressions used by the Senator from Missouri, was, that the Senator had not referred to the red lines at all; though it was possible that the words might have been spoken, without having reached his ears, as there was some confusion at the time, and as he (Mr. RIVES) was then speaking. At all event, the circumstance, if it so occurred, had made no impression upon his mind; and he had consequently no recollection of it. What he desired to say was (what had been so happily expressed by the Chair,) that it was the mind's eye by which the red line was disregarded; the red line might have been seen, but, if seen, not recognised as the true boundary; but the microscopic dotted line was insisted on by the Senator as being the true boundary. And he was confirmed in this opinion, by referring to the printed speech of the Senator from Missouri; in which he insisted, in three distinct places, upon the dotted line as being the true boundary; and, according to the recollection of the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Missouri made the remark, that any little school miss might have drawn the red line.

The Senator from Missouri seemed disposed to leave entirely in the dark the object for which he had introduced the map, and confined himself to the expression (which, undoubtedly, was intended to be understood as a figurative expression) that the broad red line could not be seen until other eyes were applied to it. He had never intended to deny that the Senator announced the red line; but what he asserted was, that the Senator had insisted upon the microscopic dotted line as being the true boundary. The whole question, then, was, in truth, a difference of impression or of recollection as to the object for which the map had been introduced. He (Mr. R.) had honestly stated his own impression as to what that object was, and that he considered the Senator as having failed to accomplish that object and in that opinion he believed he was sustained by a very large majority of the Senate. With regard to the other point, it was a matter of form merely.

Mr. BENTON said he was entirely satisfied with the explanation of the Senator from Virginia. He would now drop everything that had passed, and would merely read to the Senate the last letter which was ever written by Dr. Franklin; it was written in the year 1790, and addressed to Mr. Jefferson, who was at that time Secretary of State.

Copy of the last letter written by Dr. Franklin.

"PHILADELPHIA, April 8, 1790.

"SIR: I received your letter of the 31st of last past, relating to encroachments made on the eastern limits of the United States, by settlers under the British Government, pretending that it is the western, and not the eastern river of the bay of Passamaquoddy, which was designated by the name of St. Croix, in the treaty of peace with that nation, and requesting of me to communicate any facts which my memory or papers may enable me to recollect, and which may indicate the true river which the commissioners on both sides had in their view to establish as the boundary between the two nations.

"Your letter found me under a severe fit of my malady, which prevented my answering it sooner, or attending, indeed, to any kind of business. I now can assure you that I am perfectly clear in the remembrance that the map we used in tracing the boundary was brought to the treaty by the commissioners from England; and that it was the same that was published by Mitchell above twenty years before. Having a copy of that map by me in loose sheets, I send you that sheet which contains the bay of Passamaquoddy, where you will see that part of the boundary traced. I remember, too, that in that part of the boundary we relied much on the opinion of Mr. Adams, who had been concerned in some former disputes concerning those territories. I think, therefore, that you may obtain still farther light from him.

"That the map we used was Mitchell's map, Congress were acquainted at the time, by letter to their Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which, I suppose, may be found upon their files.

"I have the honor to be, with the greatest esteem and respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

"B. FRANKLIN.

"To THOMAS JEFFERSON,
"Secretary of State of the United States."

Mr. B. said that this put an end to Mr. Sparks's map. This letter shows that Mitchell's map, and not D'Anville's map, was that Dr. Franklin used for showing our title; and here is that map, showing our boundary along the mountain ridge by Quebec and the St. Lawrence, and going to the northwest corner of Nova Scotia, within a quarter of an inch of the river on this map—within ten or fifteen miles of it, in fact. This shows that Mr. Sparks's discovery in Paris is not the measure of our title to the Northeastern boundary.

Here the subject dropped.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The CHAIR announced the order of the day to be the unfinished debate on the passage of the bill for the settlement and occupation of the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. CHOATE, being entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate for nearly two hours. The two main topics upon which he dwelt, were: first, the question of the proposed grant of lands to settlers, as an infraction of the convention between this country and Great Britain, established for ten years in 1818, and renewed in 1827, to continue from year to year until discontinued by a year's notice from either party; and next, the question of the settlement of other difficulties with England by the late treaty, without also settling that in relation to the Oregon Territory.

In the course of his remarks, he stated that his only objection to the bill was in relation to the provision making a grant of lands. If it was recommitted, and that provision was stricken out, the rest of the bill should have his hearty concurrence. Even if the bill remained in its present shape, and it could be satisfactorily proved to him that this provision, which proposes a grant of land to settlers, is not an infraction of the treaty, he would give it his support. He would go further; he would say, that if the year's notice were given of our intention to relinquish the treaty with Great Britain, he would, after the cessation of our obligations under it, most cheerfully support a bill of this kind. But he conceived the whole question, at present, was, whether this bill, in its present form, would not be a violation of our obligations under the treaty; and that it would, he had not now the slightest doubt.

Here Mr. C. went into an examination of the terms of the treaty, with a view of showing that the only occupation or settlement which could take place in good faith, was a joint occupation and settlement for purposes of trade, hunting, and trapping; and that Great Britain never had in any single instance otherwise interpreted the treaty, or acted upon it. Her encouragement of the Hudson Bay Company was for purposes of trade and hunting, strictly in conformity with the treaty. If the company had built forts and made settlements, it was in furtherance of the objects of trade, and carrying on the trapping and hunting in which it was engaged. It was perfectly open to us, under the treaty, to do the same. He denied that England had extended over the country an exclusive jurisdiction. She only applied her own laws to her own subjects. We might do the same. If it could be shown that she ever granted away a single acre of the territory, or exercised an exclusive right of that kind, he would then say that we might do the same. But no such thing could be shown, for it had not been done.

As to the allegations that England, in a communication with the ministers of our Government, had said that British interests had grown up in the territory, which should and would be protected, he contended, that taking the whole context, and giving what followed in the sentence, so far from this being an assertion of exclusive right, or a threat of possession against the United States, the most direct reservation was made of the rights of the United States to joint occupation and interest in the territory under the treaty, by which both countries were bound. He read the passage in full, with a view of showing the correctness of his view of the avowal made by England.

In commenting upon the speech of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] who had preceded him in the discussion when the subject was last up, he took occasion to remove an erroneous impression, which he conceived was calculated to do great injustice to a distinguished man, [Mr. Webster,] who could not there defend himself. He alluded to the fears expressed by the Senator from Missouri, that the President's message declining to furnish the correspondence, or informal communications, relative to the pending negotiation about the Oregon Territory, implied grounds for concluding that propositions had been made by our Secretary of State, which the Administration was ashamed or afraid to avow; that, in fact, the rumor must be correct which had got abroad, that a proposition had been made or entertained, by the Secretary of State, to settle down upon the Columbia river as the boundary line. Now, he was glad to have it in his power to undeceive the Senator, and to assure him, which he did from authority—for he had been requested by the Secretary himself to do it for him—that he never either made or entertained a proposition to admit of any line south of the 49th parallel of latitude, as a negotiable boundary line for the territory of the United States.

After Mr. C. had considerably more at large, and in his own words, (the purport of which is only attempted in this sketch,) fully explained this matter, he next turned to so much of the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, as condemned the late treaty with Great Britain in relation to the Northeastern boundary line. He entered into a long, minute, and topographical inquiry and explanation, with a view of showing that the course pursued by the Secretary of State was the most advantageous ever attempted for this country in any previous negotiation with Great Britain. Having argued this point elaborately, he turned to the line agreed upon through the great Western lakes, with a view of proving that we had in reality—and not merely seemingly, as the Senator from Missouri supposed—gained four millions of acres of land. He quoted a pamphlet, (said to be written by Lord Palmerston,) to show that the most intelligent English statesmen considered that we had immeasurably the best of the bargain in the late treaty, and particularly as to the acquisition of this four millions of acres in the West. He traced the line from Pigeon river to the Lake of the Woods, as agreed upon, with a view of showing that it was the identical line stipulated by the treaty of 1783, as no other water-course was known till 1803 but the southern water-course adopted as the true line in the late treaty.

In conclusion, Mr. C. hoped the bill would be recommitted, and (the provision granting lands being stricken out) that the measure would be adopted.

Mr. BENTON replied to so much of the Senator's remarks as touched upon his speech; and insisted that the same line to which the Senator's concluding remarks alluded, was thirty or forty miles north of that which the Senator supposed.

Mr. B.'s remarks (which were mostly statistical) will be given in full in a day or two.

Mr. MOREHEAD next obtained the floor; and, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 18, 1843.

Mr. READ presented two remonstrances, signed by citizens of Pennsylvania, against the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RIGGS presented the petition of citizens of Whitewater, in the Territory of Wisconsin, praying the construction of a harbor at Milwaukie, in said Territory, for the protection of the commerce of the upper lakes.

Mr. GWIN offered the following resolution; and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a joint resolution, authorizing the appointment of a special agent to inquire into the alleged frauds under the pre-emption laws; the appointment of such agent having been recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his annual report.

Also, that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to amend the existing and former pre-emption laws, so as to permit the heirs or representatives of those who settled on the public lands with the intention of availing themselves of the privileges of the pre-emption laws, but who died before the forms required by said laws had been complied with, to enter the same, if satisfactory evidence is produced that the settler or settlers, if living, would be entitled to said land.

Mr. GWIN also offered the following resolution, and it was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House all the information in possession of the Navy Department in regard to the naval depot of the United States at Port Mahon, and especially whether any vessels of the United States Mediterranean squadron have been kept for any length of time in said port inactive; and if so, how long; and whether any of the officers have heretofore established themselves, during such period, on shore at that place, and for what length of time, for the purpose of keeping house, and the names of such vessels and of said officers; and further to state whether any, and what, reforms have been contemplated, or are considered to be necessary, in regard to the condition and conduct of the Mediterranean squadron in these particulars.

Mr. GWIN also offered the following resolution; and it was adopted, after an amendment had been agreed to, on the motion of Mr. KING:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House the amount of the daily expenses, exclusive of the pay of the officers and crew, of the Missouri and Mississippi steam-frigates, respectively, while in service; and to specify the amount of fuel consumed by each daily, including the amount of wastage, where the said fuel has been purchased, from whom, by whom, and at what price.

Mr. GWIN asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, (if in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public service,) whatever information may be in his possession in relation to the recent capture of Monterey, in California, by Commodore T. Ap Catesby Jones; and to state whether the said Jones had any instructions from the Government which were intended should be construed into authority for such proceedings.

Mr. LINN objected, and the resolution was not received.

Mr. BRIGGS offered the following, and it was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving a pension to John Cary, a free colored man, a native of the county of Westmoreland, and State of Virginia, now resident of this District, who says he was a body servant of General Washington at the time of Braddock's defeat, in 1755, and was present at that battle; and also, that he was a servant of General Washington at the surrender of Cornwallis, in 1781; and who is believed to be 112 years old.

Mr. TILLINGHAST rose to a privileged question, and then explained that an error had occurred in recording his vote on a motion made yesterday to fix 10 o'clock, A. M. as the hour of meeting on Friday and Saturday next, which are days appropriated by the rules to private business. Having caused a correction of the journal, he moved a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to lay that resolution on the table, observing that gentlemen who voted to meet early did not come to the House at the time fixed.

Mr. COWEN called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and the motion was laid on the table.

Mr. REYNOLDS rose to a privileged question; and was understood to move the reconsideration of some vote, which was not distinctly heard.

Mr. EVERETT desired to move a suspension of the rules, to enable the House to proceed with and dispose of, the question of reconsideration of the vote of yesterday on the passage of the bankrupt law; which was moved by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT.] He thought that should be disposed of before the House proceeded to any other business.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose (as he said) of taking up the bill for the satisfaction of claims for French spoliations prior to 1800.

Mr. EVERETT, on an explanation being given that the question of reconsideration which he wished to dispose of, would come up of course after the morning hour, withdrew his motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ADAMS then pressed his motion, and called for the yeas and nays upon it; which were ordered, and resulted as follows—yeas 107, nays 78.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

So the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the army.

Mr. PROFFITT moved to take up the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road.

The CHAIR said that the motion was not in order—the army appropriation bill having the priority—and must be postponed, in order to take up other business.

Mr. ADAMS then moved to postpone the bill, for the purpose of taking up the bill providing indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800.

Mr. PICKENS called for tellers, which were ordered; and, on taking the question, they [Messrs. SAUNDERS and READ] reported ayes 78, noes 80.

So the motion of Mr. ADAMS was rejected.

[When the committee rose yesterday, the question pending was on the following amendment submitted by Mr. DEBERRY:

"For arsenals, one hundred and ten thousand dollars; twenty thousand dollars of which to be applied towards completing the arsenal now under train of construction at Fayetteville, North Carolina."]

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. DEBERRY, it was decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. DEBERRY then called for tellers, which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS then renewed his motion to postpone the bill, for the purpose of taking up the French spoliation bill.

Mr. READ inquired if the motion was in order, a similar one having just been rejected.

The CHAIR said that it was, there having been intervening business since the same motion was made and rejected, viz: the call for and ordering of tellers on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DEBERRY.]

Mr. READ called for tellers on the motion; which were ordered.

Mr. FILLMORE expressed the opinion that motions of this kind should not be made oftener than once a day; for, by moving them in this way, just after they had been rejected, as was done by the gentleman from Massachusetts, a great and unnecessary waste of time was occasioned.

Mr. PICKENS observed that, if proceedings like this were to be tolerated, there would be no getting on with the business of the House; they would never be able to tell what they were about to do.

The CHAIR repeated his decision, that the motion was in order; and the question was taken by the tellers, (Messrs. WELLER and STRATTON,) who reported ayes 68, noes 78.

So Mr. ADAMS's motion was again rejected.

The question recurring on Mr. DEBERRY's amendment,

Mr. McKAY suggested to his colleague to modify it, so as not to increase the appropriation, but to make it obligatory on the Secretary of War to apply $10,000 of the balance of the appropriation of last year, now on hand, to the arsenal at Fayetteville. Mr. McK. said that there was an appropriation of $120,000 made last year, with the understanding that $10,000 of it should be applied to the North Carolina arsenal; and of this appropriation, he had ascertained that over $94,000 now remained unexpended in the treasury. All that was wanted, therefore, was to direct the application of a part of this sum to the object his colleague had in view. If his colleague would modify his amendment in the manner he had suggested, he presumed that no gentleman would object to it, as there would in that case be no increase of the appropriation.

Mr. DEBERRY had no particular objection to the course of his colleague, but his constituents were anxious for the appropriation which he had proposed. They strongly suspected that there was no intention on the part of the department to make this anything more than a mere arsenal of deposite. It was for this reason that the Legislature of North Carolina interfered and passed resolutions. He urged the propriety and necessity for completing this arsenal, since it was the only arsenal south of the Potomac. He did not believe in the sincerity of those officers of the department, who held out that they intended to complete the work. His constituents were tired of being tantalized and humbugged, and it was now several years since any progress had been made. He expressed his willingness to modify his amendment according to the suggestion of his colleague, [Mr. McKAY,] so as to authorize the Secretary of War to appropriate $10,000 of the money now on hand to the completion of the arsenal at Fayetteville.

Mr. McKAY read a letter from the officer under whose charge the work was; from which it appeared that a large quantity of materials was now on hand for the construction of the work, and the Government would suffer injury by allowing the works to remain much longer in their present situation.

Mr. GILMER opposed the amendment. He thought the principle wrong. He saw no reason why Congress should make any exception in favor of the arsenal in North Carolina, when the process of restricting all the expenditures of the Government was going on.

Mr. GRAHAM replied, and sustained the amendment. He contended that the Legislature should interfere in this matter. The case was peculiar. In addition to the fact that the materials were on hand, he urged the fact that no other arsenal existed south of the Potomac.

Mr. FILLMORE said, if an unexpended balance remained over from last year, it was unnecessary to give the direction in relation to the North Carolina arsenal. Let the department make the expenditure. He urged, moreover, that the proposed division of a part of the appropriation for arsenals to the North Carolina arsenal would endanger the public property elsewhere.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed a desire to have the Fayetteville arsenal completed; and pressed upon the committee the consideration, that, whilst there were many arsenals throughout the Northern and Eastern States, there was none in the South and Southwest. He advocated a reorganization and overhauling of the whole system of arsenals, contending that there were too many in some sections, and not enough in others.

Mr. GILMER inquired whether this appropriation was to complete arsenals already begun, or to erect new arsenals, or for the custody of arms.

Mr. FILLMORE said that there were but two arsenals begun which were not finished. The appropriation was mainly intended for repairs; for the items of which expenditure he referred to document No. 45.

Mr. GILMER concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CALHOUN,] that there were too many arsenals at present. He should move to reduce the appropriation from $90,000 to $50,000, so as to expend money only on those absolutely necessary.

The CHAIR decided the motion would not be in order at this time.

Mr. GILMER said he had so supposed, but now gave notice of his intention to make it at the proper time.

Mr. SAUNDERS replied to various gentlemen who had opposed the appropriation. He thought it due at least to the wishes of the State Legislature of North Carolina to make this small appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. MERIWETHER complained that he was in the dark as to the propriety of this appropriation. He did not understand the reason for many of the proposed items of appropriation, and wished for information before he could consent to vote away the public money.

Mr. GRAHAM explained, for the information of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. MERIWETHER.]

The question was then put on the amendment; and, as 16 only rose in its favor,

Mr. DEBERRY withdrew it.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia moved to strike out the whole appropriation, and insert an appropriation of $25,000 for the completion of arsenals at Little Rock, Ark., and Fayetteville, N. C. He said that the arsenals, it must be admitted, were in decent and reputable condition, especially as $90,000 of the money previously appropriated for their repair was yet unexpended. But, beyond this, it was stated by gentlemen on that floor that many of the arsenals were unnecessary; and, as the treasury of the country was, and was likely to continue, in an embarrassed condition, he had proposed to strike out the whole appropriation, and substitute a sum which would be sufficient for two arsenals, at points where it was obvious they were requisite.

Mr. GILMER called the attention of his colleague to the detailed estimates, which would show him that $10,000 only was required for each of the arsenals for which he proposed to make appropriation.

Mr. SMITH acted on the suggestion, and substituted $20,000 for $25,000.

Mr. FILLMORE expressed his surprise at the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia. He said an appropriation was necessary to repair the arsenals, both for their preservation and the preservation of the arms which they contained; and further, he deprecated the basing of legislation on unauthorized statements. Instead of $90,000 unexpended, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, there was only some $70,000; and it must be borne in mind, that that sum was appropriated to defray such expenses as should be required in the interval, up to the 1st of July, and it was for the period subsequent to that day that the appropriation under consideration was to be made.

Mr. SMITH said there was no proposition more clear than that the buildings were in good condition and repair; and, according to the gentleman's own admission, there was some $70,000 unexpended, and therefore he could not be justly charged with a desire to leave the public property to go to ruin. He then justified his motion on other grounds. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CALHOUN] had shown that some of the arsenals were unnecessary, and therefore it was their obvious duty to put them out of existence; but, in justification of his amendment, especially in relation to the arsenal at Little Rock, he reminded the committee of the proximity of 40,000 Indian warriors to that country, who could sweep its occupants from that portion of this Union.

Mr. CROSS opposed the amendment in some remarks, which were not distinctly heard.

The amendment was then negatived.

Mr. GILMER moved to strike out $90,000 and insert $50,000.

The motion was negatived.

Several items were then read and passed without amendment.

When the Clerk read the item making an appropriation for further military surveys,

Mr. GILMER said he thought that was a branch of the public service which could be suspended, and he moved to strike out that appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means how that money was expended. He thought there were men amongst the officers of this country that were competent to make these surveys.

Mr. FILLMORE understood that there was a considerable additional expense beyond that of mere officers, such as clerk-hire, transportation, &c.

Mr. SMITH observed that they had very large annual expenditures for transportation, and a number of officers of high pay. It seemed to him that the military service should be exclusively employed in these surveys. It was by employing other persons than the regular officers of the Government, that the expenditures of the Government were swelled up to such an extent.

Mr. FILLMORE spoke of the great importance of the surveys, and said that they were made so as to be ready whenever it might be necessary to erect fortifications.

Mr. SMITH observed that there were two or three different classes of fortifications, covering the whole frontier; and he could not imagine the necessity for an appropriation as small as this. He thought that these surveys were more for the purpose of giving good jobs to the officers above their regular pay, than for any real benefit to the country. Our officers were so well paid, that it was not necessary to give them such jobs to eke out their means of living.

The question was then taken on Mr. FILLMORE's motion, and it was rejected.

Mr. CALHOUN desired to ask the chairman of the committee what was meant by the clause "for expenses for preparing drawings for artillery." The reason he asked was, there was generally a proviso in the appropriation bills, that there should be no extra compensation paid to any officers, or other persons in the employment of the department. Yet, notwithstanding this proviso, the committee of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILMER] was at the head, had ferreted out the fact that many of the ordnance officers received an extra compensation of $2 per day, in addition to their regular pay, for preparing drawings of artillery. Now, it appeared to him that this kind of work was part of the regular duty of these officers, for which they received regular pay.

Mr. FILLMORE explained that there had been a board of officers appointed for the purpose of making every part of the artillery uniform, and that a draughtsman was employed to assist them. The committee, considering the extra pay of this board an abuse, struck it out of the appropriation of last year, and this year there was no estimate for it. The pay of the draughtsman, however, was estimated for; and this, with the incidental expenses of stationery, &c., made up this item.

Mr. CALHOUN said that as there had been a provision inserted in the former appropriation bills, that no person in regular pay should receive any extra compensation, the law had been trampled on by the department in making such allowances; and he would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] to call up his bill as soon as possible, to correct this and all similar abuses.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked if this $1,200 was for the purchase of paper alone.

Mr. FILLMORE answered, for drawing paper, ink, &c.

Mr. SMITH then observed, that this "and so forth" might include everything.

Mr. GILMER wished to call the attention of the committee to the fact, that in this bill there were $65,000 appropriated, by three clauses in juxtaposition, and all for the same general and specific purposes. First, there was a clause appropriating $15,000 for the surveys for the military defences of the country, inland and Atlantic; secondly, for military and geographical surveys west of the Mississippi, $15,000 for the half calendar year, and $15,000 for the fiscal year—making $30,000; and, thirdly, for the continuation of the surveys on the Northern lakes, $30,000. He did not wish to stop all those surveys, but it seemed to him that the two first were for the same objects. It seemed to him that there was a looseness, not only about the mode of appropriating the public money, but about its expenditure; and he pledged himself to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CALHOUN] to co-operate with him in checking such a course of things.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN moved to strike out the appropriation for the continuation of the surveys of the North and Northwestern lakes; for, according to the opinions held by many gentlemen there, they could not be carried on correctly without the superintendence of Mr. Hassler. We have (said Mr. B.) immediately following this appropriation, very large appropriations for the Military Academy, where for years they had been educating young men for the scientific purposes of the Government. They had an engineer corps, also, whose officers received very high salaries; and everybody must be satisfied that there were enough of them to make all the surveys, both inland and Atlantic, and carry on all the scientific works of the Government, without employing other persons. He was for employing these officers in these works; and if they were not competent, to get others in their places. These surveys cost somewhere about half a million yearly, and nobody knew where they were going on. It was time that this business was systematized, so that they might know what they were doing, and how much they were expending on it.

Mr. FILLMORE spoke of the importance of these surveys, and explained the difference between them. The object was to make them for the purpose of ascertaining the points at which fortifications would be necessary on the Gulf, on the lakes, and on the Atlantic frontier. Mr. F. handed up to the Chair a letter from the War Department, showing the importance and utility of these surveys; which was read.

Mr. C. BROWN wished to know if these surveys were made by the regular officers of the Government, or by other persons. He did not wish to stop these surveys, and was willing to incur all the incidental expenses connected with them; but he objected to the expense of employing other persons, when the Government had officers enough under regular pay.

Mr. FILLMORE believed that the work was carried on by the regular officers of the Government.

Mr. C. BROWN said that, if the gentleman meant that these surveys were for the purpose of ascertaining points for fortifications, he looked upon them as a useless expense; for, considering the changes taking place in the system of fortifications, together with the increase in the population of different parts of the country surveyed, it would be impossible now to say where it would be best to have fortifications, or of what description they should be, some years hence. He thought the officers had better be employed in walking about the streets, than making surveys with such objects in view.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to strike out $30,000, and insert $20,000 for the surveys of the North and Northwestern lakes. He said that $20,000 was sufficient, inasmuch as the department had only estimated for that sum, though the committee had given $30,000.

Mr. M. read a letter from Captain Williams, of the engineer corps, for the purpose of showing that an appropriation of $20,000 would be amply sufficient.

Mr. FILLMORE argued that the increased appropriation proposed would be greatly beneficial, in completing the survey at an earlier day than it could be done under present arrangements.

Mr. MERIWETHER contended that the present was not the time to increase such appropriations—a time when the Secretary of the Treasury told us the tariff would have to be altered so as to add $3,000,000 to the revenue of the Government. He hoped that the sum of $20,000, asked for by the officer in charge of the work, who was on the spot and knew everything about it, would be granted, instead of $30,000 as asked for by Col. Abert, who lived in Washington, and never saw the work in question.

Some conversation here took place between Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON and FILLMORE as to whether this item was not proposed and rejected last session; the result of which was, that such was not the fact.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia said that, if he understood the question rightly, the amendment involved the question whether there should be an increase of the present annual appropriation, for the purpose of completing the survey at an earlier day than was now contemplated. He argued that, in our present condition, it was better to leave expenditures as they were, than to incur any increase.

The question was put, and the amendment rejected.

Mr. REYNOLDS then rose, and moved to amend the bill, by adding after the 122d line, an item providing for an appropriation of $20,000 for a military survey from Council Bluffs, on the Mississippi, to the mouth of the Columbia river, in Oregon Territory. He stated that he desired to have this item inserted in lieu of the item of $20,000 "for surveys west of the Mississippi. The Chair, however, informed him that it would not be order to move to amend that item, as it had been passed upon by the committee; and it was for this reason that he offered the amendment to come in at the end of the section. He then addressed the House in a strain of forcible reasoning in favor of his amendment. It was not, as gentlemen might think, an extraordinary proposition. It was important as bearing upon the proposed settlement of Oregon Territory; and he hoped that gentlemen would not be so squeamish as to refuse to allow our citizens to take possession of that territory, merely because England pretended to have a right to it. If England had any claim whatever to the soil of Oregon, it was confined to that portion above, the mouth of the Columbia, where the survey he proposed would not touch. He expressed an anxious desire that the attention of members should be called to this subject, in order that they might consider the propriety of hereafter constructing a military road in Oregon. For the purpose of giving an opportunity to gentlemen to weigh the matter well in their own minds, he would move that the committee rise, and then let the question be taken on his proposition to-morrow.

Mr. FILLMORE appealed to the gentleman to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. REYNOLDS consented to do so.

Mr. FILLMORE entered into an explanation of the subject, and urged that there was no necessity for the specific appropriation wished by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. REYNOLDS] The amount appropriated in this bill for surveys, exceeded that appropriated for some years past. The item, too, for surveys west of the Mississippi river, ($20,000,) might, under the direction of the department, be applied towards the very object desired by the gentleman, [Mr. REYNOLDS] The House, he thought, should not decide upon the manner in which this appropriation should be expended, but should leave it to the department. He also would remind the gentleman from Illinois that there was already a survey or map in existence, which had been prepared by Captain Wilkes when on the exploring expedition.

Mr. REYNOLDS replied generally to the objections of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE.] He contended that Congress—elected for two years, and more responsible to the people than any public officer—was better qualified to decide what surveys were best for the interest of the Government, than either the Secretary of War or the President. If he were anxious to know as to surveys about Buffalo or the surrounding country, he would sooner take the statements of the gentleman, (its Representative,) than all the secretaries in the country. So, too, he would rather have the opinions of the Representatives of the people, coming from every part of the Union, in relation to these local surveys, than those of public officers in Washington city. As to the map of Captain Wilkes, referred to by the gentleman, that might be very good in its way, and very accurate and very pretty; but he did not want a survey or map of Columbia river only. That might be well enough for navigation; but it would not answer the purposes of the people, who wished a military route to Oregon, in order that they might go there with their families and settle.

Mr. R. concluded by moving that the committee now rise: previous to putting which motion, some conversation took place between Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, FILLMORE, and CALHOUN, in relation to a bill to prohibit extra allowances to public officers; the result of which conversation was an agreement to have the Committee of the Whole discharged from the further consideration of said bill, instead of reporting it to the House.

The motion that the committee rise was then put, and carried.

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the bill prohibiting extra allowances to officers of the Government.

Mr. McKENNAN asked if it had been before a committee.

Mr. ARNOLD said it had not.

Mr. FILLMORE had no doubt it was a very proper bill.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. BLACK, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to amend the several acts organizing the Governments of the several Territories of the United States; and it was read twice and committed.

Mr. MALLORY offered a resolution requiring the Secretary of War to report to this House a practicable plan for the reduction of the expenditure of the Military Academy at West Point, and to limit the number of cadets, so as to correspond with the wants of the country and the strength of the army.

Mr. CUSHING objected, and the resolution was not considered.

Mr. J. T. MASON presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Maryland, in relation to the stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FILLMORE presented a statement of the receipts of the Government for the last quarter; which was ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 19, 1843.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of Indiana, on the subject of the rigid construction given by the Postmaster General to the post office laws. Mr. S. remarked that there was much feeling in the whole Western country concerning a regulation of that department, making pamphlets and newspapers (which may happen to have the name of the person sending such matters through the mail) chargeable with letter postage. Great difficulty and much feeling are the consequence of such construction of the post office laws, especially in the State of Indiana; so much so, that the attention of the Legislature had been called to the subject, and that body have passed the resolutions he then presented, urging a repeal or modification of that portion of the laws of the department which justified such a regulation. He hoped the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which he proposed to refer the resolutions, would give the subject their attention. The resolutions were then referred, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs or the assignees of of the heirs of Isaac Todd and James McGill," reported the same back with an amendment, being a substitute for the bill.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with an amendment, House bill 619, for the relief of Asahel Lee, Harvey Lee, and Lemuel Lee.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Duncan L. Clinch; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. G. also reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, House bills for the relief of John Drysdale, and for the relief of Johnson Patrick.

Mr. MERRICK presented a communication from the Governor of Maryland, enclosing resolutions adopted by the Legislature of that State, relative to a proposed transfer of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, to the State of Maryland, on the condition that that State will complete the canal to Cumberland before the expiration of five years from the time of transfer: ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. PORTER presented a memorial from 142 citizens of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files the memorial and documents of John Goode.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the previous orders of the day were postponed, for the purpose of taking up, as in committee of the whole, the bill for the benefit of the Petersburg Railroad Company.

Mr. E. explained, that there were several cases before the Finance Committee in respect to an extension of the time during which railroad iron, to be actually laid down, might be imported free of duty. This was not one of those cases. All those cases now before the committee, were where railroads were in progress of construction, and where it would take some years for their completion; but the case now before the Senate differed in that respect: the railroad was completed, and the company were relaying a portion or all of it with new and better iron, in consequence of a portion of it being worn out. The iron was imported, and in the country. The company have it in their power to lay it all down before the 3d of March next, and entitle themselves to the benefits of the provision in the tariff bill allowing iron laid down before that time to be free of duty. They will lay it down by that time, unless Congress think fit to prolong the time for doing so. But, in order to have it done before the 3d of March, the company will have to employ a considerable number of persons more than they now have, and may probably have to suspend transportation and travel on the road until it is done. This, too, is the line on which the mail is conveyed. If you force the company to this, it will interrupt very much the Southern travelling; and the work would have to be done in a hurried manner, and might be consequently improperly done, and be the cause of accident hereafter. This bill involved none of the principle contained in the other cases before the committee, for the general admission of railroad iron free of duty for a longer period than the tariff of last session justified. The bill proposed to give this company till the 1st day of December next to lay down the rails, so that the work might go on gradually, and be well done.

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired what was the quantity of iron involved in the bill?

Mr. EVANS said, about 2,000 tons.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked whether the tariff law was to be repealed, because it did not suit the convenience of the company to comply with its provisions? This bill came up suddenly this morning, and he had not time to examine it. He had no objection to let it pass this stage; but, unless his present impressions were removed, it should not pass any other stage by his vote.

There being no proposition to amend the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. MOREHEAD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any letters or communications on file in the War Department relative to the granting by the British Government to the Hudson Bay Company, and by that company to individuals, of any portion of the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. MOREHEAD made some remarks on the importance of the resolutions, after the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] on yesterday, on a portion of a report made out by Mr. Greenhow, concerning the cessions by Great Britain to the Hudson Bay Company, of land in the Oregon Territory; after which, the resolution was adopted.

The following bills were then taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading, viz:

House bill (319) for the relief of Samuel Hambleton.

House bill (427) for the relief of the administrator of John Jackson.

House bill entitled "An act for the payment of seven companies of Georgia militia, for services rendered in the years 1840 and 1841," was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Messrs. KING and CALHOUN did not see the necessity for the passage of this act, inasmuch as they did not know the reason why these militia could not be paid under the existing general law, which provided that all militia called out by the Governors, and mustered into the service of the United States, should be paid, upon the muster-rolls showing the service being duly authenticated and presented at the War Department. If the service was actually performed, and the militia entitled to pay under the provisions of the existing law, but, owing to some informality could not receive it, they were willing to vote for a bill to authorize payment, notwithstanding such informality.

Mr. CRITTENDEN remarked that the Committee on Military Affairs were satisfied that these militia were entitled to pay; and reported back the bill for that purpose. They did not, however, inquire into the reason why the War Department had not allowed the pay under the existing law. He had no objections to let the bill be postponed until the exceptions taken by the War Department could be inquired into.

The bill was then, on the motion of Mr. KING, laid on the table until the inquiry could be made.

Mr. MOREHEAD presented the credentials of JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, esq., who was elected by the Legislature of Kentucky to be a Senator from that State in the Congress of the United States, for six years from and after the 4th day of March next.

THE EXCHEQUER BILL.

On motion by Mr. TALLMADGE, the bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department of the United States was taken up, and postponed till Wednesday next, and made the special order for that day; and Mr. T. expressed a hope that they would be able to give it consideration at that time.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from John Golden, of the city of New York—who represents that, in 1835, he received a patent, under the United States patent laws, for an invention of his to issue credit paper; and that he has the exclusive right to that kind of issue; and prays that authority be given him by Congress to issue an amount of credit checks, not exceeding $100,000, under the exchequer board, on his own name, in consideration of his yielding up to Congress his rights under his patented invention. This, being a subject of finance, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Copeland," was taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. CRITTENDEN made some remarks explanatory of its provisions, and said that the Judiciary Committee were of opinion that it should not pass. He moved that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. STURGEON made some remarks in favor of the passage of the bill.

The question was then put on the motion for indefinite postponement, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill to refund the balance due to Massachusetts for disbursements during the late war with Great Britain, came up in order, as in committee of the whole, on an adverse report of the Committee on Military Affairs; but was, on the motion of Mr. BATES, postponed till Tuesday next, and made the special order for that day.

The bill for the relief of William De Peyster and Henry N. Cruger was taken up as in committee of the whole; and, after a few remarks by Mr. CRITTENDEN, explanatory of its provisions, and there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SEVIER presented a memorial from the delegation in the House of Representatives from the Territories, soliciting the appointment of a standing committee by the Senate, to be called the Committee on Territories, to take charge of Territorial business; which being read, Mr. S. gave notice that he would on to-morrow morning introduce a resolution so to amend the rules of the Senate as to authorize the appointment of a standing committee of five, to take charge of Territorial business.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. presented to the Senate the credentials of GEORGE MCDUFFIE, Esq., who was elected by the Legislature of South Carolina a Senator from that State, in the Congress of the United States, for six years from and after the 4th of March next; which were read.

Senate bill entitled "An act to regulate enlistments in the army, and navy, and marine corps," came up in order as in committee of the whole.

Mr. BAYARD remarked that there was a proviso in the bill which provided that no negro or mulatto should be enlisted in the service of the United States, except in the capacity of musicians, cooks, or stewards. This provision (he said) was introduced into the bill at the last session, on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] after considerable discussion. The committee thought it better, therefore, to let it remain. It was his wish, however, that this proviso should be so modified, that, for temporary service in unhealthy climates, negroes or mulattoes may be treated as a part of the crew on board of those vessels in which they may be employed. On the coast of Africa and the Chinese Sea, it was extremely unhealthy; in consequence, they were compelled to employ natives of the country temporarily to do such duties as were required to be done on shore. It was not proposed to employ negroes in the service, in our own country—such was not the object of the amendment; but, as he said, its object was to authorize the temporary enlistment on foreign stations, and in unhealthy climates. If they were employed at all, it was necessary that they should be enlisted, that they might be subject to the rules and articles of war, and be entitled to receive their pay.

Mr. BENTON was understood to remark that this was the way the thing spreads. One of the requirements of the new British treaty was, that 80 guns should be kept on the coast of Africa. So, in order to carry out that treaty, it now becomes necessary to permit negroes and mulattoes to be enlisted in the service of the United States. He was against it altogether. He was opposed to the repeal of existing laws for any such purpose.

Mr. BAYARD thought the Senator was under a mistake in supposing there was any existing law which precluded negroes or mulattoes from being enlisted in the service of the United States. The superior courts had, indeed, decided that foreigners could not be enlisted; but there was not one word against negroes or mulattoes, until this identical bill was passed by the Senate last session, with the proviso suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] which limited the purposes for which they might be enlisted. Although this bill had passed the Senate, it was too late to meet the action of the other House, and it fell to the ground. On bringing it forward again, he had learned that the few amendments now offered would be necessary. It was the opinion of an experienced officer serving on a foreign station, that this amendment would place it in the power of the service to spare the lives of Americans, who could not stand the climate on land, at night, in the vicinity of the Chinese seas and other stations. At Ceylon, he was informed, a whole boat's crew might perish by being obliged to lie on shore one night; for such things had happened where boats were sent for water, and had to stay on shore for the night. Now this bill would enable our officers on such stations to employ, for temporary purposes, and for a limited time, the natives, who are accustomed to the climate, and can stand it.

The question was then put on the amendment, and disagreed to—ayes 14, noes 17.

Several verbal amendments were made, and the bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

OREGON TERRITORY.

The order of the day brought up, as the unfinished business, the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, on which the pending question was the passage of the bill.

Mr. MOREHEAD, who was entitled to the floor, said that, for reasons which he had stated this morning, when offering the resolution calling for information from the executive department as to the allegation that the British Government had made grants in the territory, and which information he expected would be laid before the Senate to-morrow morning, he would move that the bill be passed over informally; as it would be extremely desirable, in the further discussion of the subject, that there should be some knowledge of the grounds on which the allegation, so often alluded to, had to rest.

Mr. BENTON said that, before the question was put on the postponement, he would ask the indulgence of the Senator for a few remarks which he deemed it necessary to make in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CHOATE] who spoke yesterday. It was chiefly in reference to the Northwestern boundary line agreed upon in the late treaty. A good deal had been said about the Northeastern boundary line, without the subject being at all exhausted; and it was now time to say something about the Northwestern boundary line of that treaty.

Mr. B. then produced a large map of the territory though which the Northwest boundary line passes, and pointed out the trading route, called the portage route, from the Pigeon river to the Lake of the Woods, and the route called the water communication, lying considerably to the north of the portage route. What he contended was, that the treaty of 1783 designated the water communication as that intended for the boundary line, and that it was the true boundary line of the United States. He further contended, that so convinced were the British themselves of this fact, that, in 1802, they broke up the depot of their Northwest Fur Company at Grand Portage, and removed it fifty miles north, for the purpose of getting off the territory of the United States, and evading the duty to which their goods were liable to the United States. The portage route was then exclusively ours: and we had, by the treaty of 1783, a joint right to the use of the northern watercourse forming the intended boundary line. By the treaty of 1842, our American negotiator had surrendered up what was admitted by the British to be ours in 1842; had given them the exclusive right to the northern water communication; and had brought them back to the joint occupancy of the portage route; from which, like the Jews, they were forty years wandering in the wilderness. Their hearts yearned after the flesh-pots of Egypt, and this modern Joshua had led them through the wilderness to their land of promise. And not content with giving them everything they craved, he made the President say, in his message, things calculated to make the American people believe that everything of theirs which he had given away, instead of proving a loss, proved an acquisition of four millions of acres of valuable mineral lands.

Mr. CHOATE replied, and entered upon proof, from what he considered concurrent testimony, that the water communication meant by the treaty of 1783 was the portage route—partly water and partly portage; because, from the beginning of the world to that day, no other route or communication was ever known from the Pigeon river to the Lake of the Woods. What he contended for was, that, as the words of the treaty of 1783 could not literally be applied to any one line of communication—no watercourse from the river to the lake being continuous—they must be taken in the geographical sense, and could apply to nothing else but the known and established route travelled by the French, when they owned Canada, before 1760, and by the English, who succeeded them, down to the time of the treaty of 1783.

[This explains the point of controversy between the two Senators, so far as it can be rendered intelligible without the aid of maps. They alternately addressed the Senate several times—referring to documents, maps, treaties, and evidence derived from statements made by both Englishmen and Americans.]

The question was then put on passing over the bill informally, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 19, 1843.

Mr. WASHINGTON presented (under the rule of the House heretofore established) the petition of Lewis Gordon, a disabled seaman, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. REDING presented the petition of Theodore Gould, of Haverhill, New Hampshire, praying for a pension; which was appropriately referred.

Mr. BIDLACK presented three memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt act; which were laid on the table.

Mr. RIDGWAY presented a memorial, signed by 48 merchants and others, of the county of Franklin, Ohio, praying Congress to restore the summer term of the United States circuit and district courts of Ohio, to Columbus, the seat of Government of that State. Also, a memorial signed by 11 members of the bar, and others, of the town of Delaware, Delaware county, Ohio, of the same character; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMERICAN HEMP.

Mr. GARRETT DAVIS called for the second reading of the joint resolution to establish agencies for the purchase of water-rotted hemp.

Mr. EVERETT objected to the consideration of any business out of its regular order.

The CHAIR suggested to the gentleman from Vermont, that the resolution came up upon its second reading under the rules. It was then read the second time, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorised to establish an agency in the State of Kentucky, and an agency in the State of Missouri, for the inspection, test, and purchase of water-rotted hemp for the use of the American navy.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and then, by general consent, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCLELLAN of New York asked leave to offer the following resolution, which was read for information:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to this House copies of the returns made to him by the several district attorneys, clerks of the circuit and district courts, and marshals of the United States, of the fees and emoluments received by them, respectively, in pursuance of the provisions of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year eighteen hundred and forty-two."

Mr. EVERETT objected to the resolution, under the apprehension that it would give rise to debate.

Mr. McCLELLAN moved a suspension of the rules; which being carried, the resolution was considered and adopted.

SOLDIERS OF OLD INDIAN WARS.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana presented a memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, praying the passage of a law to extend the benefits of the act of Congress of June 7, 1832, to the volunteers and militia who were in service against the Western Indians, from the nominal close of our revolutionary war by the treaty with England in 1783, to the final close thereof, by treaty with the Indians at Greenville, in 1795.

Also, a memorial and joint resolution of the same body, on the subject of the Post Office laws.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

Mr. GIDDINGS asked leave to offer a resolution directing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to repeal the act of the last session of Congress entitled "An act providing for the armed occupation of Florida."

Objections being made by several,

Mr. GIDDINGS moved a suspension of the rules; but the motion was rejected without a division.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT ACT.

The SPEAKER announced that the next business in order was the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary repealing the bankrupt act.

Mr. CUSHING, in reply to questions from several members, asking which bill it was, explained that it was not the one that was passed, and upon which a motion for reconsideration was pending; and moved to lay it on the table, which motion was carried.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The bill to authorize the chief clerk in the Department of State to frank public and official documents sent from that office, was read the second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the third reading of the bill, and observed that it was only authorizing the chief clerk in the Department of State to do what the Secretary has the right to do.

Mr. EVERETT objected to the third reading today, and the bill was therefore passed over.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked the House to take up the bill introduced by him, prohibiting extra allowances to officers of the Government.

Mr. CUSHING objected, and the motion was not, therefore, put to the House.

Reports of committees, being the next business in order, were called for by the Chair, and the following were made:

Mr. MOORE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to lands within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas to institute suits to try the validity of their claims," approved May 26th, 1824; and extending the same to claimants to lands within the limits of the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and for other purposes: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MOORE, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Philander Smith and James Young; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. DEBERRY, on leave, presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina on the subject of the United States arsenal in that State: laid on the table.

Mr. STANLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of sundry citizens of Virginia, on the subject of the superintendency of the national armories; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANLY, from the same committee, reported a bill in addition to the act for the payment of the Florida militia, who were called into service during the years 1839 and 1840: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. W. O. BUTLER, from the same committee, reported a bill to amend the act entitled "An act respecting the organization of the army and for other purposes," approved 23d August, 1842: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GOGGIN, from the same committee, moved that it be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Uriah Brown; which was agreed to.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following joint resolutions; which were severally twice read, and referred:

A joint resolution in favor of Frances M. Lewis; and

A joint resolution in favor of Mary Neale.

Mr. F. WOOD, from the same committee, reported a bill making an appropriation for the construction of a floating dry-dock at Pensacola; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States as communicated the late treaty with England, reported a bill for carrying said treaty into effect; which being read,

Mr. CUSHING observed, that the House would perceive that the bill just reported was for execut-

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED BY BLAIR AND RIVES, AT ONE DOLLAR PER SESSION, IN ADVANCE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1843. VOLUME 12....No. 12.

ing what was called the Ashburton treaty. The Committee on Foreign Affairs had charge of the general subject, by the reference to them of a portion of the President's message at the commencement of the session, and particularly by the references of the message communicating the treaty. The committee had, therefore, reported this bill for the purpose of carrying into effect those provisions of the treaty which required the legislation of Congress. The sixth article was as follows:

"It is furthermore understood and agreed, that for the purpose of running and tracing those parts of the line between the source of the St. Croix and the St. Lawrence rivers, which will require to be run and ascertained, and for marking the residue of said line by proper monuments on the land, two commissioners shall be appointed—one by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and one by her Britannic Majesty; and the said commissioners shall meet at Bangor, in the State of Maine, on the 1st day of May next, or as soon thereafter as may be, and shall proceed to mark the line above described from the source of the St. Croix to the river St. John; and shall trace on proper maps the dividing line along said river, and along the river St. Francis to the outlet of Lake Pohenagamook; and from the outlet of the said lake, they shall ascertain, fix, and mark, by proper and durable monuments upon the land, the line described in the first article of this treaty; and the said commissioners shall make to each of their respective Governments a joint report or declaration, under their hands and seals, designating such line of boundary; and shall accompany said report or declaration with maps certified by them to be true maps of the new boundary."

In looking at the treaty, it was found that not only the 6th article, but others, required appropriations to carry them into effect; but for one of the other articles the Committee of Ways and Means had already reported an appropriation of $300,000 in the general appropriation bill, viz: to pay and satisfy the States of Maine and Massachusetts for the expenses incurred by them in protecting and surveying the disputed territory. It was found, however, by reference to the rules of the House, that the Committee of Ways and Means were prohibited from including in the general appropriation bills any appropriations for carrying treaties into effect. Therefore there were two appropriations to be made under that article; and it would be found, on referring to the rules of the House, that there was a rule providing that an appropriation for carrying out a treaty shall not be included in the general appropriation bill. The rule is in these words:

"In preparing bills of appropriation for other objects, the Committee of Ways and Means shall not include appropriations for carrying out treaties made by the United States; and where an appropriation bill shall be referred to them for their consideration, which contains appropriations for carrying a treaty into effect, and for other objects, they shall propose such amendments as shall prevent appropriations for carrying a treaty into effect being included in the same bill with appropriations for other objects."

Thus it became necessary that all appropriations for carrying out treaties should be made in separate bills; and in this case it was deemed judicious to do it in the bill providing for the appointment of a commissioner. The committee had also further, in the execution of the treaty, thought it proper to insert the 6th section, for the provision of a squadron for the coast of Africa. That section is in these words:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in the execution of the provisions of the 8th article of said treaty, to apply so much of the naval appropriations as may be necessary therefor to the preparation, equipment, and maintenance of the naval force therein stipulated to be employed on the coast of Africa by the United States."

As this bill contained appropriations he moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in the usual course.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL inquired if there was any report accompanying the bill.

Mr. CUSHING replied that there was not a report; but he would state that it was contemplated to make a report, which would be presented before the bill came up for consideration.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL was understood to inquire the nature of the report.

Mr. CUSHING replied that he would only yet say that there would be a report.

After a few words of conversation and explanation between Mr. FILLMORE and Mr. CUSHING, the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then continued the call for reports, and the following were presented:

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill entitled "An act making appropriation for a law library for the use of the court of appeals for the Territory of Florida;" which was read twice, and committed.

He also reported a bill making appropriations for completing the public buildings of Florida; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. STALEY N. CLARKE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Edgecomb; which was read twice, and committed.

And, also, a bill granting a pension to David Munn.

Mr. BABCOCK reported a bill for the relief of Jacob Miller; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made divers adverse reports.

Mr. READ, from the same committee, made an adverse report in the case of Peter W. Short.

Mr. STRATTON was also understood to make an adverse report on the case of James Stevens.

Mr. McKENNAN moved that the Committee on Roads and Canals be discharged from the further consideration of a petition for a harbor at Racine, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported the Senate bill for the relief of the Steamboat Company of Nantucket; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

Mr. HUNT (who was entitled to the floor during the morning hour, for fifteen minutes, being the residue of his hour, partly occupied on a previous day) then resumed his speech on the subject of General Jackson's fine, the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE] coming up as the business next in order. He said his time was too limited to permit him to go into this subject as he desired; but he proposed to show that, by the Constitution of the United States, and the laws on the subject, Judge Hall was justified in the course he took; that he was bound to issue the writ as he did; and that he was equally bound, in reference to the dignity and the integrity of his court, to punish as for contempt, and to punish summarily. The first authority to which he would call the attention of the House was the third article of the treaty of Paris of April 30, 1803—the treaty by which this country obtained what is now Louisiana:

"ART. 3. The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

The next authority to which he asked the attention of the House, was the act of the 8th of April, 1812, admitting Louisiana into the Union. The second section of that act provides as follows:

"And that all the laws of the United States, not locally inapplicable, shall be extended to the said States, and shall have the same force and effect within the same, as elsewhere within the United States."

Now, what were the laws of the United States, that, by the article of the treaty of Paris, and the act admitting Louisiana into the Union, were to extend and operate over that State? The act of 1789, commonly called the judiciary act, showed what some of them were; and, amongst them, there was a law extending to the inhabitants of that State the writ of habeas corpus. He asked the attention of gentlemen to the 14th and 17th sections of the judiciary act of 1789. The 14th section was in these words:

"That all the beforementioned courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law; and that either of the justices of the Supreme Court, as well as judges of the district courts, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of commitments."

The 17th section contained these words:

"That all the said courts, &c. shall have power, &c. and to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of said courts, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before the same."

These 14th and 17th sections were expressly extended to Louisiana by the treaty to which he had called the attention of the House, and by the act of 1812, from which he had already quoted; and yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania had said that there was no law there in force but the laws of Spain or Portugal, and France.

But, in this connexion, he referred to the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States, which, of itself, would settle this question. The 4th section of the 4th article of the Constitution has these words:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion."

And now he would say a word to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL] respecting the case of Judge Peck, which, probably, gave rise to the act of 1831. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would not find, from the beginning to the end of the proceedings in that case, (and the managers appointed on the part of this House were men of the highest abilities,) that it was assumed or admitted that in any other case than that under consideration could Judge Peck have been subjected to impeachment. Judge Peck had undertaken to punish as for contempt when the case was one of libel; but it was not admitted that in any other class of cases he could have been subject to impeachment. And he (Mr. H.) should like to know if, anywhere, contempt was punishable with the intervention of a jury? The gentleman from Pennsylvania had referred to the act of 1831, in the course of his observations, and, therefore, he (Mr. H.) would briefly allude to it.

In consequence of the act of Judge Peck, the Legislature of the country passed a law, pointing out the future limits within which judges should confine themselves; but, on looking over that law, he found that it expressly recognised the case existing before Judge Hall, and only went to strip judges of the power which Judge Peck exercised—of punishing as for contempt libel committed out of his court. With the permission of the House, he would read the first section of the act of March 2, 1831, which was passed in consequence of the act of Judge Peck. It was as follows:

"That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishments for contempts of court, shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice; the misbehavior of any of the officers of the said courts in their official transactions; and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts."

Now, with what face could the gentleman from Virginia say that, in the act of 1831, there was any condemnation of the course pursued by Judge Hall? He (Mr. HUNT) submitted, then, that, both by the Constitution and the laws of this country, Judge Hall was bound, or he would have violated his oath of office, to issue the writ, and to punish contempt summarily and without the intervention of a jury.

Here the gentleman's hour expired, and Mr. BOTTS obtained the floor.

Mr. FILLMORE requested the gentleman from Virginia to give way, for a motion either to take up the question of reconsideration of the vote by which the bankrupt repeal bill was passed, or to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman from

New York that there were various Senate bills on the table, and also several Executive messages, the disposal of which he suggested.

The several Senate bills were accordingly read twice, and committed; and the Executive messages were presented to the House, and appropriately referred. Of the Executive communications, there were the following:

A communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the report of the surveyor general of Arkansas and the Territories of Wisconsin and Florida.

Also, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the number of officers, &c., at the port of New York on the 1st July, 1828, and the 1st January, 1842, and the amount of revenue at those two periods.

Likewise, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th January, 1843, in reference to goods lost by fire in the public stores of New York.

The SPEAKER also submitted a communication from the War Department, in answer to a resolution of the House adopted on the 14th ult., calling for a survey in Florida: referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MATHIOT, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Nancy Wilson: twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. FILLMORE called up the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, which was passed by the House, but still on the Speaker's table, in consequence of a motion of reconsideration made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT.]

Mr. CUSHING, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at length, in reply to the remarks made by various gentlemen, during the last three weeks in relation to the present Administration. He commenced by remarking that the President of the United States was accused of obstructing the passage of Whig measures of relief, and was charged with uncertainty and vacillation of purpose. As these charges had been made against the President, he felt it to be his duty to ask the country who was chargeable with vacillation and uncertainty of purpose, and the destruction of measures of relief? Who were they who, with sacrilegious hands, were seeking to expunge the last measure of the "ill-starred" extra session from the statute-books? Forty-seven Whigs, he answered, associated with the Democratic party in the House, and formed a coalition to blot out that measure. [Laughter, and cries of "Good."] He repeated it: forty-seven Whigs formed a coalition with the Democrats to expunge all the remains of the extra session which existed. For three weeks past, there had been constantly poured forth the most eloquent denunciations of the President, of the Secretary of State, and of himself. He might imagine, as was said by Warren Hastings when such torrents of denunciation were poured out upon him, that there was some foundation for the imputation of the orators. He should inquire into the merits of the political questions, and into the accusations made against him. He was told that he had thrown a firebrand into the House—that he had brought a tomahawk here. He denied it. He had done no such thing. It was not true that he commenced the debate which was carried on; and when gentlemen said that he had volunteered remarks out of the regular order, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] he told them that they were not judges. His mode of defence was counter-attack, and it was for him to judge of the argument. If he carried the war into the enemy's camp, the responsibilty was with those who commenced the attack.

It was arrogated to themselves by the Whigs, that they possessed the exclusive license of attack, and that the friends of the Administration must not stand up and defend themselves. According to these gentlemen, he must not resist the attacks made upon him. He understood his rights; and if gentlemen would assail the Administration—if they would pour out frantic abuse upon it, it was his right, to reply, whenever his convictions of duty enabled him. In doing this, he had held up a magic mirror to the country. He had placed before the House the means by which members could read their own hearts. When gentlemen undertook to arraign him for alleged sins against the Constitution and the form of our Government, and put upon him an imputation which could not be found in his speech, and which he challenged them to justify by pointing out one sentence,—when gentlemen come here into the House and do this, he declared that it was an endeavor to pass upon the country the false coin of political profession. Was there any one who would say that, of 242 members of this House, every man was free from political motives in his conduct? He repelled the charges which they made upon him and upon the Administration; and he should endeavor to show that they proceeded only from interested motives, whether of fame, wealth, power, or anything else by which men were banded together as parties. What was a party? He defined a party to be an association of men seeking to get power.

When they talked of principles, what did they mean? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] did not develop any principles on which he acted. Principle with that gentleman was a measure—the United States bank. Did the United States bank constitute principle? Did the sub-treasury of itself constitute a principle? The gentleman from New York [Mr. McKEON] nods assent. If such a thing constituted principle, he (Mr. C.) scorned the idea. He did not recognise the notion that the question whether the public deposites should be kept by a cashier or an agent, constituted a principle. He scorned the idea that a man should be called a traitor if he did not rally around the sub-treasury. He well understood what the gentleman from New York [Mr. McKEON] meant by principles; and that was, the restoration of the expelled Bourbons, and with them the revival of their repudiated sub treasury—a return to power, to revenge themselves upon those who had an agency in their expulsion. As to the principles of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL] he should wait until that gentleman should have had an opportunity to develop them, before he made any comments.

Thus, then, when he saw that the questions now agitating the country were questions of party; that parties were divided upon the issue of what they called the principles of a national bank and a sub-treasury, he thought it was time for the country to interfere, and prevent the interests of the people from being crushed between the upper and nether millstones. For presenting the true issue to the country, and for calling upon the House to aid the constitutional chief of the Government in carrying on the Government, he had been accused of offering at auction the power of the Federal Government! When he saw the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. R. W. THOMPSON] occupying an hour in expanding a paragraph from the Globe into a speech, and the gentleman from New York responding to the strain of his argument, he was reminded of a portion of the funeral oration of Antony over Cæsar, (which Mr. C. recited.) When he found the gentleman from Indiana taking up the interested lead of the Globe, and re-echoing the charges of the Globe, he asked himself, was that gentleman in favor of Mr. Van Buren for the Presidency? If not, he could not explain why that gentleman had fallen into the trap set by this organ of Mr. Van Buren; and it, indeed, seemed to him that the gentleman, and those who followed him, were like the wild bull in the Spanish shows, who rushed at the red flag held out to him, whilst the matador stood by to plunge the dagger in his side.

He would ask gentlemen to consider the merits of this debate. What was the point in the eloquent denunciations and the continued invectives which had been heaped upon him? He argued that the people of the United States were peculiarly a nation of political-readers, and that they prided themselves upon their political information; but, in their reading, there was too much of party—too much of the superficial party discussions of the day. If a man advanced a general idea of political action apart from party, the people fell into spasms at the paradox; and the remark was immediately made a subject of attack by all the champions of party. This was illustrated by the treatment of a remark made by him at the last session, upon the exercise of the veto power by the President. For weeks together, he was denounced for advancing the very idea which was to be found in the works of Madison. But it was necessary, to be made a topic of reproach against one of the friends of the President; and, therefore, it did not avail anything to show that he was right, and that the very doctrine which he advanced was once uttered by Henry Clay in a corresponding debate in the Senate of the United States. The same line of debate was renewed upon him at the present session.

The position of the two great parties, and those few who stood here to defend the acts of the Administration, was peculiar. Our Government was now undergoing a test in a new particular. This was the first time that the Administration of the Government had ever devolved upon the Vice President. Now, he had called upon the people and the House to adapt themselves to that contingency, and support the Constitution; for with the "constitutional fact" was associated the party fact; and whilst the President was not a party chief, there was a party chief of the party in power. The question was, whether there could be two Administrations—one, a constitutional Administration, by the President; and the other, a party Administration, exercised by a party chief in the Capitol? With this issue before him—whether the President, or the party leader—the chief in the White House, or the chief in the Capitol—should carry on the Administration—he felt it to be a duty which he owed to the Government of his country to give his aid to the constitutional chief. That was the real question which had pervaded all our contests thus far. He said to the majority here, that it was no less their duty to their party than to their country, if they expected to succeed, to aid the Administration in carrying on the Government. It was not merely the only mode in which they could carry on the Government, but also the only means by which they could maintain the ascendency of their party in power. Every consideration of duty invoked them to sustain the President.

He (Mr. C.) had been charged with separation from the Whig party as a crime. He would say that, had that party followed his advice, they would now have been powerful, united, and omnipotent, as at the commencement of the Administration; but he was overruled, and the batteries of the two political parties were both turned upon the President. The question with all was, What were the interests of party? From that time all discussions were but the voice and the echo of party. The inquiry did not arise how the public interests were to be affected by any measure; but the President was accused of treason, whenever he did not approve of it. Yes; the President was accused of treason—not to the Constitution, nor to the Government of his country, but to party. Instead of asking what was the President's duty to the country, they only inquired what he ought to do for the party. In this view of matters, he (Mr. C.) took his stand in defence of the Constitution. He cared not what might be the clamors of party men raised around him. He should stand and permit himself to be hewn down, rather than yield any of the positions which he had taken. In this spirit he came to touch upon the topics advanced in the general debate upon the merits of the Administration. Each party had an interest in misconstruing the Administration. All parties here wished to break it down, by making an attack on the motives of its friends.

They expected it; they were ready to encounter it; they appealed to time for a judgment on their actions, and the course they had pursued. What was it that the gentlemen from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] and Indiana [Mr. R. W. THOMPSON] and Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] had imputed to them; giving the lead in this debate to all the denunciations which had been poured upon them? The gentleman from Maine admitted that he had adopted the idea of the gentleman from Indiana, in charging him (Mr. CUSHING) with offering the power of this Government at auction, as the price with which to purchase a party in that House; and he challenged the gentleman from Indiana to point out a sentence of his speech which could bear such a construction.

Mr. THOMPSON rose; but

Mr. CUSHING said he could not yield the floor.

Mr. THOMPSON said, then, he hoped the gentleman would not challenge him for an explanation, unless he would yield the floor, to give him an opportunity to make it.

Mr. CUSHING said the gentleman could not escape in that way. He had felt it to be his duty to spread out an article of the Globe, and he would have opportunity sufficient to explain hereafter; but he (Mr. CUSHING) could not now yield any part of the half hour that remained to him.

The gentleman from Maine had said that, instead of replying to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] who commenced this debate, he (Mr. C.) had only devoted ten lines to that gentleman's speech.

Mr. FESSENDEN rose.

Mr. PROFFIT. "Order!" "order!"

Mr. CUSHING refused to yield the floor, and continued his remarks. The gentleman from Maine said he (Mr. C.) began the attack on the Whig party at the extra session; but he denied that that was true. He spoke but once on party questions at the extra session, and then in reply to assaults on the Administration.

Mr. FESSENDEN again rose, but

Mr. CUSHING said he could not—he would not—yield any part of the small portion of time remaining to him, and continued. The gentleman from Maine said that, at the commencement of the second session, he began a like course of remark; but he (Mr. C.) said that was not true. Late in, or about the middle of the session, he did reply to various speeches; but he did not begin the attack on any gentleman, or any party. It was after a debate in which many gentlemen had spoken, that he replied to those gentlemen. The gentleman from Maine then proceeded to say, that, in the controversy of the last session, it was not as alleged by him—it was not a fact that the Whig party was broken to pieces against the fixed constitutional fact of the constitutional power of the President; but it was in consequence of the disappointment felt on the failure of measures of relief. What measures? Did not the President concur with the House in the enactment of the bankrupt law? And when had he asked for its repeal? Did not the President concur in the passage of the distribution act? And when the House and the Senate chose to pass measures for relief, what measures did they pass in which the President did not concur? There was nothing but the United States Bank in which he did not concur; and he (Mr. C.) appealed to this House, and from this House to the people of the United States, whether there was anything else; and he there asserted that a majority of the people of the United States were opposed to a United States bank.

The gentleman from Indiana had quoted from a speech of his in 1834, on the bank bill, for the purpose of showing an extreme inconsistency on his part; to which he would only reply, that he could not conceive that political blindness could be so obtuse as not to perceive that the experience of the last four years in the history of the Bank of the United States must have affected every one's judgment in regard to that bank. Were they expected to fix their judgments and opinions on what they were before that period? Were they expected to retain opinions held before the gross corruptions and abuses of that bank were brought to light? He denied that the people of the United States, or a majority of them, were in favor of a United States bank; but if this were so, it did not change the nature of the constitutional fact to which he had adverted.

Mr. C. then referred to and quoted some remarks of Mr. FESSENDEN, in which he spoke of the power of the President over the public press, and of the venality and corruption of some of the Whig newspapers. Mr. C. said that the remarks of the gentleman involved two facts. In the first place, there was the allegation that the entire Whig press was venal; and, in the next place, that it was bought up by the President of the United States. There could be no other meaning attached to the gentleman's remarks. In reply to the gentleman, he denied the venality of the press in these broad terms. He admitted that there was much of the extreme of faction in it; there was faction in that House, and among the people; and it was consequent on the common passions of our nature: but it was not true that the press was thus venal, and under the control of the President of the United States; and that, being bribed by him, it had calumniated the present Congress. The gentleman had supposed an impossible fact. The President never possessed the patronage sufficient to materially affect the press; and what little patronage he did possess, had been taken away by the act of the last session. The gentleman from Maine then proceeded to arraign him (Mr. C.) as a no-party man, and to pick out of the newspapers and quote against him a migratory paragraph which some of them had extracted from Jonathan Swift; and Jonathan Swift, the most corrupt tory of the corrupt reign of Queen Anne, with Lord Bolingbroke by his side, was used to arraign him for his speeches in an American Congress. All the coarse denunciations of that man, (who was not inaptly termed the libeller of his generation,) vented forth against the party opposed to him, in order that he might hound on the dogs of faction, were quoted against him, because he deprecated faction and party excitement. He was ashamed that any gentleman should come into that House, and read lessons on party spirit from the most factious and corrupt writer that ever existed. There were lessons on that subject, which it would better have become the gentleman to read from; such, for instance, as the farewell address of the Father of his Country, from which the most wholesome and useful instructions could be drawn. He would have the gentleman from New York, also, [Mr. GORDON,] who seemed to correspond with the gentleman from Maine in his ideas of the blessings of party spirit, to reflect on the same lessons. He would have that gentleman and his colleague [Mr. McKEON] to remember the letter of Andrew Jackson in 1816, to James Monroe, in which he also invoked his countrymen to banish all party spirit from their councils. On this subject he must advert to what was an indisputable fact in the history of the world. There had been two combinations of republics precisely analogous to ours—he meant the republics of Greece and the Italian Republics. Both these republics were bound together by a community of language and of customs, of origin and of interest. Any one who would read and reflect upon their histories, would see that it was party spirit, and the spirit of faction, that caused their overthrow. As illustrative of this fact, he begged leave to read a passage from the warrior statesman and historian of one of these confederated republics—Thucydides.

Now, it seemed to be supposed by these two great parties that the moderate men of the House and country were to be the victims of both of them. He begged gentlemen not to delude themselves with the idea that he was a moderate man, or that he had the least idea of becoming the passive victim, in the words of Thucydides, of these two factions. Had not the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] and himself opinions of their own, which they possessed the right to advocate and defend? So far as they had the power to influence the opinions of the people of the United States, it was their right and their duty to exert it, as well as the right and duty of the men connected with this Administration. Instead of holding out the spoils of office, as the gentleman from Indiana charged him with doing, he did but exercise the right and duty belonging to him and every citizen, to be heard at a proper time on the question of the Presidency. This the gentleman called, like the chief of the Prætorian bands, putting up the empire at auction. Now, he should suppose that the language he used would, instead of being considered a tender, or a seduction, be considered in the light of an indecent threat on the House; for that, and that alone, was the disingenuous construction that could be put on his language. The gentleman from Indiana, as he had already said, did not signalize any portion of his remarks on which he founded the imputations he cast out. Till the gentleman did that, he had no answer to make, except the one he would now give—and that was, the most emphatic denial of all these imputations. When the gentleman could put his hand on that portion of his remarks on which he founded these imputations, then it would be time enough for him to answer them. No gentleman had yet done it; and, though he had challenged them again and again to do so, they confined themselves to these general denunciations. It would be in vain for him to combat this man of straw which gentlemen had raised up; and he would, therefore, dismiss that part of the subject.

It was his wish—and, but for the limitation of the time allowed him, it was his intention—to comment particularly on the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RAYNER,] as well as the speech of the gentleman from Indiana; but he was admonished by his friends around him that his time was fast passing away. He would merely say, in reference to the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, that he, in common with the gentlemen from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] did not impute to him (Mr. C.) corrupt motives, though he imputed what he (Mr. C.) was bound to disavow. The gentleman from North Carolina in the rhetorical illustration and exaggeration of his ideas, (so common with members on that floor,) objected that, in the face of this House and the nation, he (Mr. C.) had declared that the power and patronage of this Government would be exercised in favor of those in power. Now he denied that he ever made any such declaration; and he challenged the gentleman to show it. The remark he made had a far different tendency, and rose far above the murky atmosphere which pervaded that House. His allusion was to the carrying on of the Government, and to the duty of every man, no matter to what party he belonged, to co-operate with the President in that object. It was immaterial whether the Government was carried on by Whig or Democratic votes, or by a combination of both, so that it was rightfully administered. If it could not be carried on by Whig votes, might it not be carried on by Democratic votes, or by a combination of parts of both? It was all idle delusion to say that there was anything wrong in the President's calling on either of the two parties, or on both, to aid him in carrying on the Government. Did any gentleman complain of the tariff law of the last session, because it was carried by a combination of Whig and Democratic votes? Was that corruption, any more than the President's carrying on the Government by the aid of any votes he might get for that purpose? There was no more wrong in the fact that he, a member of that House, should carry an important measure either by Whig or Democratic votes, as he could get them, than for the President to carry on the Government by the same means.

In the few moments left him, he desired to say that this Administration stood upon its acts and measures, and went before the country by whom it was to be judged upon them. All these questions of the hour would pass away with the hour; they were transient, and could not awake the interest of posterity. They would pass away; and if this Administration was to be condemned—which he was sure that it could not justly be by those then, around them, upon its acts and measures—it would appeal to posterity against the party excesses and extravagant acts of party spirit which occasioned its condemnation. It had been too much the custom in that House to indulge, on general questions, in broad and sweeping denunciations of men; to talk of treachery, and of the shameless acts of the Executive, and those around him; and this was to delude the public mind, and to stimulate it into hostility to the Administration. He did not know but that the indignation excited by such of these denunciations as had fallen to his share, might have caused him to retaliate, by using corresponding language. If so, he regretted it, and hoped that he might be excused for it. He might now move the previous question; but would decline doing so, as some gentlemen might wish to reply to them.

Mr. FESSENDEN said, as the gentleman from Massachusetts had such opportunity to prepare a defence, he really had supposed they should have had something like an argument. The gentleman from Massachusetts must have understood the sentiment of the House respecting his remarks on a previous occasion—for all sides of the House put the same construction on them; and he took it for granted, the gentleman's explanation would now be made. But he put it to the House, as to a jury, on the case, whether they had had anything in the gentleman's speech, this morning, except the merest special pleading in defence of himself. Why did the gentleman from Massachusetts confine himself to a single sentence of his (Mr F.'s) speech?

He pursued this train of remark; and of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he said the House judged not by a single sentence, but by its whole tenor.

Mr. CUSHING insisted that a false construction had been put on his remarks. He had made such remarks in his place as he had a right to make, and they had been misrepresented.

Mr. FESSENDEN said the gentleman's speech was published in the newspapers, and its truth and accuracy were not denied; and if it was not correct, he had had an opportunity to say what he did mean.

Some conversation ensued between the two gentlemen respecting the published reports of their respective speeches, and other matters of no public importance.

Mr. FESSENDEN then resumed; and, in reference to the accusation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that he had charged that gentleman with beginning the attack on the Whigs at the extra session, he said he denied that he had said any such thing.

Mr. CUSHING. It is in your printed speech.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I said no such thing as that the gentleman "began the attack." I said that he began his attack at the extra session; and I ask the gentleman if, at that session, he did not attack the Whig party?

In such explanatory observations, the gentleman from Maine continued his speech in reply to the various branches of that of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. G. DAVIS then obtained the floor.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON appealed to him to yield it, for the purpose of enabling him to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING.]

Mr. G. DAVIS declined yielding the floor, glad as he should be to oblige his friend from Indiana.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON said he would make a remark, expressing his reason for desiring to reply to the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts at this time. That gentleman, after 21 days of deliberation, reflection, and study, now came here and charged him with expanding an editorial article in the Globe into a long speech. Now, he wished the opportunity to reply to this charge impromptu—to take up the club, and dare the gentleman to meet him—to challenge him to a debate on the spot, without prompting from any editor, or from elsewhere.

Mr. G. DAVIS said the time was so short, and, if he yielded the floor, it was so uncertain whether he could again obtain it, that he was compelled to go on with his remarks. He then proceeded to say that he was opposed to the reconsideration of the vote on the passage of this bill, (the repeal of the bankrupt law.) In so announcing himself, it would be sufficient for him to say that his course was taken in consequence of the well-settled and well-ascertained wishes of his constituents—nine in ten of whom were opposed to the law. He admitted that he was not bound to obey all the admonitions of popular feeling; but, in the present instance, their judgment was the result of time and of deliberation.

He felt gratified at the party character which the debate had taken, because he held it to be important to the preservation of the institutions of the country that the measures of its administrative and legislative departments should be strictly scrutinized and investigated. Were he in power, he should not shun any investigation.

He replied to the portion of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] relating to the alleged dictation of the ex-Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Clay.] The gentleman from Massachusetts declared that there were but two alternatives—one, a constitutional administration, under the lead of the President; and the other, a faction, under the lead of the Senator from Kentucky. Such remarks were no more nor less than calumnies on that distinguished man; and he would ask the gentleman what principle Mr. Clay had changed, by which he had obtained the ill-will of the gentleman, after having had his support for fifteen years previous to the extra session? He asked, Did the Senator from Kentucky bring forward any new measure at the extra session? Did he enter upon any untrodden path, in order to embarrass the path of John Tyler? No, was the answer.

He replied to the remark so often to be found in the speeches of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the Whigs were embarrassing the administration of Mr. Tyler; and enumerated ten measures passed at the extra session by the Whigs, and opposed by the Democrats, all of which measures, he said, were necessary to enable the President to carry on the Government—the repeal of the sub-treasury, the donation to Mrs. Harrison, the distribution law, the bankrupt law, the loan bill, the fortification bill, the bill to pay the debts of the Post Office Department, the change of the tariff, by adding three new articles, and saving the treasury, and the two bank bills. All these measures were recommended by the President, and supported by the Whigs, and opposed by the Democrats; yet the Whigs were charged with obstructing Mr. Tyler. He also enumerated ten measures passed by the Whigs at the last session of Congress, on the recommendation of Mr. Tyler; all of which were opposed by the Democratic party.

He went into the subject of the party relations subsisting between the President and the two parties, at large; commenting upon the course of Mr. Webster, and eulogizing the public conduct and political career of Mr. Clay. He concluded his remarks at half past three o'clock.

Mr. MARSHALL entered into a legal and constitutional argument in explanation of his objections to the bankrupt law: and then said, that beyond those objections, he had the imperative voice of his constituents at home to urge him on to seek its repeal. He next went into the general subject of debate, with which he consumed his hour.

Mr. PROFFIT then obtained the floor, and remarked, that as he was in some measure responsible for the present debate, by his having moved the reconsideration of the vote on the passage of the bill, and as several gentlemen had spoken, he would now withdraw his motion.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON appealed to his colleague not to withdraw the motion, in order that he might have an opportunity to reply to what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.]

Mr. PROFFIT declined doing so.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS inquired if he could not renew the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER said it was too late.

So the bill to repeal the bankrupt law goes to the Senate forthwith.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 20, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, covering reports from the Surveyors General of the State of Arkansas and the Territories of Iowa and Wisconsin, which had not been received at that department when the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office was sent in; which, on motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

committee of the whole, on certain amendments, which were agreed to; and, there being no motion to further amend the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CHARTER OF ALEXANDRIA.

The bill to amend the charter of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was taken up, read the second time, and taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. MILLER explained that the object of the bill was to allow the legal voters of that town the right to elect their mayor by ballot. He was now elected by the common council. The passage of the bill was urged not only by a majority of the common council, but by a large majority of the people. The Committee on the District had reported favorably to the passage of the bill.

Mr. SEVIER remarked that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MILLER] spoke of legal voters. He wished to be informed what were the qualifications for a legal voter in that town.

Mr. MILLER replied, that to be a legal voter, a person must be 21 years of age, be a freeholder, and must have resided in the town one year previous to the election.

There being no motion to amend the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, made a report (which was ordered to be printed) adverse to the passage of the bill from the House, for the relief of Samuel B. Tuck.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a resolution, so to amend the 33d rule of the Senate as to add to the list of standing committees a Committee on Territories.

The resolution lies on the table one day, under the rule.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, House bills of the following titles, viz:

The bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act of 24th May, 1828, to continue a copyright to John Rowlett."

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Lord;" and

The bill for the relief of Charles B. Hall.

BANKRUPT LAW.

House bill entitled "An act to repeal the bankrupt law," was taken up, read twice, and, on motion by Mr. BERRIEN, referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Senate bill for the relief of Richard Henry Wilde was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. BERRIEN explained that the object of this bill was to secure to Mr. Wilde, an American citizen, the benefits of our copyright law, in relation to the productions of his literary labors, which are of such a nature that he can hardly expect, in the first instance, remuneration for their publication in this country, until they shall have gained some celebrity abroad. He is under the impression that he could sell his copyright in England, so as to avoid the expense and risk of getting out his works, upon which he has spent great labor, time, and research. He desires to be secured in his right, as an American citizen, to the benefits of our copyright law in the United States, after his books shall have been published abroad. It was considered by the committee to whom the bill had been referred, that this was a peculiar case in which it would be well to extend the indulgence required.

Mr. TAPPAN thought the same case might be applicable to many authors, citizens of the United States; and there could be no reason in favor of this special case, that would not be equally strong in favor of others. He, therefore, moved an amendment, in substance, to strike out the name of "Richard Henry Wilde" wherever it occurred in the bill, and substitute such words as would make its application general to authors, citizens of the United States.

Mr. BERRIEN conceived it would be best to confine the bill to the isolated case which Congress was called upon to act. He did not think the Senate was prepared to go into the general subject of revising the copyright law. He thought the proper course would be to allow this bill to pass, and to institute an inquiry into the propriety of revising the general law.

Mr. TAPPAN intimated that, if his amendment was to meet with opposition, he should require the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRITTENDEN requested the bill and amendment would be read.

They were read accordingly.

Mr. KING had not particularly examined into the subject of the copyright law; but his present impression was, that there should be no legislation at all in relation to it. But, if a majority of the Senate decided on passing this bill, it ought to be made general in its application. It was not his intention, in any case, to vote for it, because he was opposed to the principle of partial extensions of the copyright law. If he could have been induced to make any exception, it certainly would have been it favor of Mr. Wilde. He was, however, compelled, under a sense of duty, to move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. BERRIEN argued at considerable length against the indefinite postponement of the bill, and in favor of the propositien to legislate alone on this isolated case. If other cases of like claims should hereafter come up, they, also, could be legislated upon separately. He stated that the subject of Mr. Wilde's labors was Italian literature; for which there was not, at present, a market in this country. The bill only proposed that if, hereafter—that is, after the publication in England—the work should prove of such consequence as, from its reputation abroad, to create a demand for its republication in this country, he should be entitled to the benefit of our copyright law; to which, as an American citizen, he would unquestionably be entitled, without this special act, but for the previous publication in England.

The debate was continued some time by Messrs. BUCHANAN and ALLEN against the bill, and by Messrs BERRIEN, CRITTENDEN, and BAYARD in its support; and by Messrs. WOODBURY and CONRAD in favor of Mr. TAPPAN's amendment.

The question was then taken on Mr. KING's motion of indefinite postponement; and decided in the negative—yeas 12, nays 26.

The question then recurred on Mr. TAPPAN's amendment; and it was rejected.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PETERSBURG RAILROAD COMPANY.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the bill for the benefit of the Petersburg Railroad Company was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that this was a very important bill, and, as the Senate was very thin, he hoped it would be laid over.

Mr. EVANS said there was so little time between this and the 3d of March, that there was good reason to fear, if the bill was not passed today, it could not be acted upon in time.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was sorry to be obliged, at so late an hour, to trespass upon the patience of the Senate; but he was desirous of stating his views upon this subject. And, at the very commencement of the debate, (for the bill was not going to pass sub silentio,) he must be permitted to state, that he did not believe that any other than an incorporated company would have made the request contained in the memorial upon which this bill was founded. He had no prejudice against incorporated companies; but he thought, when they reviewed the history of this railroad-exemption question, they would have every reason for believing that the question ought to be allowed to rest, at least, until a general revision of the tariff.

Under the act of May, 1830, privileges were conferred upon the railroad companies which were not enjoyed by individuals. The farmer, who tills the soil—the merchant, who builds ships to navigate the ocean,—all were obliged to pay a duty upon the iron which they used in their respective employments; but the railroad company having petitioned Congress, got an act passed to reduce the duty for their special benefit, from the rate paid by all other classes of citizens, down to 25 per cent. And not content with this, two years afterwards they petitioned Congress again, and were relieved from the payment of all duties whatever. And it was an astonishing fact, that this railroad company, (if he understood the matter correctly,) had got a remission from Government of duties to the amount of upwards of $83,000. Releasing the duties upon their iron to that amount, was precisely equal to bestowing upon them that sum after it had been collected and placed in the treasury.

Let us examine this matter a little farther. At the extra session in 1841, the question arose, whether railroad iron should be taxed as all other iron? And the Senator from Connecticut proposed to allow the railroad companies an extension of the privilege of importing their iron free of duty until the 3d of March, 1843; making a period of eighteen months. He, (Mr. B.,) with that good nature which he trusted had always characterized him, agreed that the time should be extended. And now what was it that they proposed to do by this bill? It was proposed that all the railroad iron which might be in the country, under the compromise that was made upon that subject, at the extra session, between the Senator from Georgia and himself, may be laid down hereafter; thus repealing the principle which was laid down in 1841 and in 1842. What was that principle? He observed that a bill had been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in the other House, giving to all the railroad iron that may be laid down previous to the 3d of March, 1843, the privilege of drawback of all the duties. What reason was there for exempting these corporations from the payment of duties, which all other classes of citizens were obliged to pay? It was never intended, according to the construction of the original law, to establish the principle that any railroad company should be permitted the opportunity of introducing two sets of rails without duty. The old iron, when taken up, would sell for more than was originally paid for it by them. Now, under what specious garb did this entering wedge present itself? They were told that all the railroad iron had been imported, and that they could comply with the law, and lay it all down previous to the 3d of March; but that it would be inconvenient to do so. He (Mr. B.) knew enough about the construction of railroads, to know that it was the simplest thing in the world to lay down the iron, after preparation had been made to receive it; and the sooner it was laid down after the road was prepared for it, the better. As to stopping the travelling, he had seen new rails laid down when the cars were passing twice every day. All they had to do was to connect the old with the new rails. It was one of the plainest mechanical operations in the world.

He was anxious to see what would be the result of the present application. He had agreed, in good faith, to extend the law of 1841, until the 3d of March 1843. The company had had eighteen months in which to complete their work; and they now came forward and said they wanted six months longer. It amounted, in fact, to a repeal of the duties on all railroad iron.

He would now give the Senate a small particle of information upon this subject of exemption. In consequence of the law which they had passed, placing a duty upon iron, two very large establishments had been created in Pennsylvania for the purpose of manufacturing railroad iron. One of them, called the Great Western Iron Works, had been established with New England capital, and was situated upon the Alleghany river. The company had contracted with Governor Morrow, as president of the Little Miami Railroad Company, for the delivery at Cincinnati of three hundred tons of railroad iron, at $50 per ton; and that it had been delivered according to contract, and was of an excellent quality. He had been informed that these iron works could, at the present moment, manufacture 100 tons of railroad iron per week, and that they were now engaged in making a quantity of such iron, either for the State of Indiana, or a company within it—he had not learned which. And now, at the very time when this company was manufacturing railroad iron—not only to the extent of the demand within the State of Pennsylvania, but also furnishing the State of Indiana—they were applied to again, to suspend the duty upon that article; thus holding out to Pennsylvania a promise to the hope, and breaking it to the reality: first, placing a duty upon iron by the tariff bill; and then, by exceptions subsequently made, defeating their former act. And for whose benefit? For the benefit of incorporated companies. It was (as he said before) the entering wedge against the common right of the citizens of the United States.

He declared most solemnly that he would rather, at this moment, vote for a drawback on iron employed in the building of ships, than to vote for this bill for the exclusive benefit of railroad companies, who were not subject to foreign competition at all. He thought the question had been settled. He had yielded to the former urgent demands made by associated wealth upon Congress, through a spirit of compromise and conciliation. Now, the demands were repeated; and they might rest fully assured that those companies would never be satisfied, as long as they continued to exist, with the ordinary privilege of citizens.

As regarded this company, he was glad to hear that they could lay down their rails before the 3d of March, and he thought they should be limited to that time. He had no doubt, however, that this bill would pass the Senate; but he did not think it would go through the House of Representatives at so galloping a rate. He had never heard of the bill until yesterday; and now it appeared everything else must be suspended, in order to hurry it through. He was aware of the power of moneyed corporations; and that those gentlemen who had presented their petitions would remit no efforts to secure the passage of the bill, and he should look with considerable interest upon the result. He was anxious to know whether the benefits of the tariff bill, which passed both Houses by the votes of Pennsylvania members, were now to be withdrawn by special legislation.

He would add nothing farther; there were other gentlemen in that body as deeply interested in this question as he himself was; he would leave to them the discussion of the question. But he wanted to see what would be the fate of the bill, for it would be, as sure as that he was now speaking, but the entering wedge to the complete destruction of the benefits of the tariff law, so far as the State of Pennsylvania was concerned.

Mr. MILLER saw nothing in this peculiar case that would not apply to every railroad company entitled to the privilege of the provision in the tariff law. If this bill is passed, every other railroad company in the country may come in and show the same grounds for claiming an extension of the time from the 3d of March to some distant day; which claims, if allowed, would amount to a repeal, for the time, of the law imposing a duty on railroad iron.

Messrs. EVANS and CRITTENDEN contended that it was only an indulgence which the Petersburg Railroad Company solicited; which would make no difference to the revenue, as the iron was already in the country, and could be laid down within the time by extraordinary expense and exertion, and the greatest inconvenience to the public; as, in that event, all travelling on the road should be suspended; whereas, if time were given, the new iron could be laid down gradually, and without interruption to the regular trains.

The subject was further debated by Messrs. PHELPS and ARCHER.

Mr. SEVIER moved to lay the bill on the table till Monday, as the hour was late, and the Senate would have to go into executive session.

Mr. EVANS said it might be passed over informally.

The bill was accordingly passed over informally.

Mr. SEVIER moved that, when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday; which was agreed to.

The following engrossed bills were then taken up, read a third time, and passed:

An act to regulate enlistments in the army, and navy, and marine corps of the United States.

An act for the relief of Wm. De Peyster and Henry N. Cruger.

An act for the relief of the administrators of John Jackson.

An act for the relief of Samuel Hambleton.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the Senate then went into executive session, and soon after adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 20, 1843.

Mr. TROTTI of South Carolina presented the petition of Gilbert Stalker, praying remuneration for a steamboat lost in the service of the United States on the coast of Florida.

Mr. MEDILL presented the petition of Andrew F. Tyler, of Morgan county, Ohio, who lost his health while in the army of the United States, praying a pension: referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BARNARD rose to make an inquiry in relation to a statement which appeared in the journal of yesterday, read this morning. It was there stated that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bankrupt law was passed was withdrawn by the mover; from which statement, the inference was that the bill was passed. He would respectfully inquire of the Chair whether it had been established, by precedent, that the mover of a motion to reconsider had the right to withdraw it at his pleasure.

The SPEAKER replied that such was the fact.

Mr. BARNARD said that, if there was no precedent on record, he would raise the question. The power to withdraw a motion to that effect, gave to one individual the means of preventing a reconsideration of any measure which might have been passed. He again inquired whether the point which he raised had been decided by the House on an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER said that the House had so decided, and at the last session.

ASSUMPTION.

Mr. SUMMERS presented a memorial from Kanawha county, Va., in favor of an assumption of State debts, as proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON.] He moved that it be referred to the Select Committee on that subject.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PENDLETON, the memorial of the people of Cincinnati, (which, he said, was prepared with great care and research) on the subject of removing the obstructions in the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUDSON made an adverse report.

EXPENDITURES IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MERIWETHER offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy inform this House what amount has been expended under the act of Congress authorizing the building of a war steamer by —— Stevens; whether the building of said vessel is now going on; and what, if any, amount of the appropriation therefor has been transferred to any other object; and whether the expenditures for "pay of commission, warrant, and petty officers, and seamen" for 1842, has exceeded the amount appropriated by the act of Congress in 1842; if so, to what amount, and from what source has the deficiency been supplied; and whether the expenditures for increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the navy, has exceeded the appropriation therefor, and from what source the deficit has been supplied.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired whether private bills would be debatable to-day.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. FILLMORE said he must then call for the orders of the morning hour, in order to enable the House to go into Committee of the Whole as soon as possible.

Mr. G. DAVIS made further inquiries in relation to what was the order of business. He was understood to ask on what days private bills were debatable.

The SPEAKER said on every Friday and Saturday except the first and last of the session, private bills were debatable.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BRIGGS called up the bill now on its third reading, to authorise the chief clerk in the State Department to frank public documents.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered.

Mr. McKENNON said he should be in favor of the bill, if it extended, the franking privilege to the chief clerks of other departments as well as the Department of State. As it was, he must oppose the bill.

Mr. BRIGGS explained the object of the bill. At present, the franking privilege was possessed by the heads of bureaus in the departments generally. The public documents of those departments were now franked by the heads of their bureaus. [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL. But never by the tail of a bureau.] Now, there was no bureau in the State Department; and hence the Secretary of State was obliged to frank all the documents of his department. The object of the bill was merely to give his chief clerk the right of franking public documents—a right expressly limited and restricted by this bill.

Mr. TALIAFERRO rose to a question of order. He contended that the consideration of this bill was not now in order, but must come in its proper place on the calendar, which was sixth on the list of subjects.

The SPEAKER decided that the bill was in order now, having been engrossed, and laid on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ADAMS advocated the passage of the bill There was a reason for granting this privilege of franking to the chief clerk of the State Department, which did not apply to the other departments. The Secretary of State was charged with the duty of distributing all the printed laws of the United States. This duty occupied much of his time, as he could attest when in the State Department himself, and when its business was much less than at present. The bill was merely to relieve the Secretary of much drudgery which he now had to undergo.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL opposed the bill. He thought the duties of other Secretaries were much more onerous than those of the Secretary of State. Had not the Secretary of State more time to perform his ordinary functions than either the Secretary of the Treasury, War, or Navy? He instanced the labors of the Secretary of the Treasury, which were incessant; "still beginning—never ending," and who had no assistance in this respect of franking. He was well aware that this was the most abused of all privileges, and he was ready to reduce rather than extend it.

Mr. TILLINGHAST contended that this bill contemplated no extension of the franking privilege. It was not an extension, but a substitution, to relieve the Secretary of his immense labors in franking.

The previous question was then moved and seconded.

The main question was then on the passage of the bill; which, being taken, resulted in yeas 120, nays 69, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arrington, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Bidlack, Birdseye, Black, Borden, Botts, Brewster, Briggs, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Burnell, Green W. White—59.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. MALLORY asked leave to offer the following resolution; which was read for information:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to report to this House, as early as practicable, a plan for the reduction of the expenses of the military academy at West Point; and to limit the number of cadets so as to correspond with the wants of the country, and the present strength of the army.

Mr. FILLMORE objected; and

Mr. MALLORY moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of offering the resolution; but the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER announced that reports of the standing committees would be the next business in order; and, being called for, the following reports were made:

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of D. and J. Wilkinson; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. TOMLINSON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Andrew Fisher; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. COWEN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William W. Street, and a bill for the relief of Gamaliel E. Smith; which were severally twice read, and referred.

WAREHOUSING SYSTEM.

Mr. McKEON inquired of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce when they might expect a report on the warehousing system.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland replied that the committee were now engaged in preparing their report, and that it might be expected shortly.

COLORED SEAMEN.

Mr. WINTHROP, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of Benjamin Rich and others, on the subject of the imprisonment of colored seamen arriving in some of the Southern ports, made a report thereon; and moved that it, together with the report of the minority of the committee, which he said would be made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RAYNER,] be printed.

Mr. RAYNER presented the report of the minority, on the same subject, and moved that it be printed.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland said that, as one of the committee, he dissented partly from, and agreed partly with, both reports. He would probably have an opportunity of presenting his views on the subject when it came up; and perhaps he might prepare an additional report. At present, he would move the printing of an extra number of copies.

The reports having been read,

Mr. BLACK moved to lay the motion to print on the table.

Mr. WINTHROP called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; when

Mr. KENNEDY withdrew his motion to print the extra number of copies, and

The question was taken on Mr. BLACK'S motion to lay the motion to print on the table; and the result was yeas 73, nays 114, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Barton, Black, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, P. C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Wm. B. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Charles A. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Williams, Winthrop, Wood, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—114.

So the motion to lay on the table was not carried.

A message was here received from the President of the United States, by the hand of Robert Tyler, esq., his secretary, transmitting various bills which had been approved and signed by him.

The question then recurred on the demand for the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put; and the motion to print the ordinary number of both reports was then agreed to.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired if the morning hour had not expired?

The SPEAKER replied that it had.

Mr. FILLMORE said then he would move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but, before the motion was put, he would send a resolution to the Chair, for the action of the House, with the observation that the House must bear in mind that there was a special order for Monday.

The resolution was read; and it proposed to fix half-past two o'clock to-day to terminate debate in Committee of the Whole on the army appropriation bill.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved to lay the resolution on the table, and the noes appeared to have it. A division was called for, and only 46 voted in the affirmative. The noes were, therefore, not counted; and the resolution not carried.

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved to amend the resolution by fixing two o'clock to-morrow, instead of half-past two o'clock to-day, to terminate debate.

Mr. FILLMORE, (to prevent a waste of the time of the House by a useless discussion,) moved the previous question; which was seconded. The main question was also ordered to be put, and the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee was agreed to.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS then renewed the motion to lay the resolution on the table; which was agreed to—83 voting in the affirmative, and 58 in the negative—the vote being taken by Messrs. M. A. COOPER and MATHIOT, tellers.

Mr. COWEN called for the orders of the day; but he gave way to

Mr. HOPKINS, on whose motion a change was given to the direction of a bill, the title of which was not heard.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the committee resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GIDDINGS insisted that his colleague [Mr. COWEN] had called for the orders of the day.

Mr. COWEN asked if, after the orders of the day had been called for, it would not require a vote of two-thirds to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER'S reply was not heard.

Mr. CHILDS, with unanimous consent, reported a bill from the Committee on Commerce for the relief of Samuel Hoffman; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. GORDON also reported a Senate bill from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BRIGGS withdrew his motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GIDDINGS called for the orders of the day

The SPEAKER accordingly announced the question to be on the bill for the relief of the inhabitants of West Florida; on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had the floor.

Mr. COWEN said he was anxious that the private business should be proceeded with; and, therefore, he raised the objection to this bill, that it was rather of a public than a private nature.

The SPEAKER decided that the bill must be considered as private. The Chair could not undertake to go beyond its face, from which it appeared to be a bill for the relief of private citizens in Florida.

Mr. ADAMS inquired whether it would be in order to move a postponement of the bill under consideration until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER said it would.

Mr. ADAMS was understood to express a desire that the bill for the relief of the heirs of Philip Renault should now be disposed of. After a brief argument against the bill under consideration, and an expression of his desire to occupy the floor on to-morrow against the passage of the bill, and the principles on which it was founded, he concluded by moving its postponement until to-morrow.

Mr. LEVY said he had no objection to the course proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] provided the postponement would not hazard the final action of the House on the bill. He hoped it would be allowed to take precedence of other business.

Mr. ADAMS then modified his motion so as to make the bill the special order for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of the heirs of Philip Renault. The pending question was a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. JOHN YOUNG (who held the floor) addressed the House at length in opposition to the motion to reconsider, and in favor of the justice of the claim of Renault.

Mr. WELLER called for the previous question, but the call was not sustained by the House.

Mr. C. JOHNSON then addressed the House in opposition to the bill.

Mr. ADAMS supported the claim, and was followed in the debate by Mr. MOORE, Mr. STUART of Illinois, Mr. POPE, and Mr. CUSHING.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL expressed a desire to have the question postponed for a week longer.

Mr. CUSHING made a motion to that effect.

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved the previous question; which motion prevailing,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 21, 1843.

Mr. NEWHARD presented the petition of Jacob Wilt, of Lehigh county, Pennsylvania, a soldier of the revolutionary war, praying for a pension.

The SPEAKER called for reports from committees.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL, with unanimous consent presented resolutions adopted by the Legislature of South Carolina on the subject of the tariff; which were read at his request, and then referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported several Senate bills, without amendment; among which was a bill entitled "An act to extend for a longer period the several acts for the relief of insolvent debtors of the United States:" this bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill further to continue in force the act for the payment of horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States; which was read twice.

Mr. C. then moved that it be put on its third reading; and the question was put on its engrossment.

Mr. GRANGER and Mr. LINN objected, on the ground that, if it did not make an appropriation, it took money from the treasury, and therefore must be committed.

Mr. TURNEY said its commitment would be tantamount to its rejection, and therefore he moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER said the previous question would bring the House to a direct vote on the engrossment.

Mr. EVERETT moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and resulted—yeas 52, nays 114.

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

The question was then taken on the demand for the previous question, and carried in the affirmative.

The bill was ordered to its engrossment; and, having been read a third time, was passed.

Mr. GOGGIN presented certain papers in relation to the Creek Indians in Alabama; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President, in relation to the tonnage duty on Spanish vessels, reported "a bill concerning tonnage duties on Spanish vessels:" read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RODNEY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Amy McGuire, widow of the late Major Thomas McGuire: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Sampson Brown: twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SANFORD, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Wm. Patterson: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. POPE, from the Committee on Territories, reported a "bill fixing the boundary between Missouri and Iowa;" which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported sundry bills in relation to the lunatic asylum and the custody of lunatics: read twice, and referred.

COMMODORE AP CATESBY JONES.

Mr. BOTTS offered a resolution, calling upon the Secretary of the Navy for all correspondence and information in that department, in relation to the rumored recall of Commodore Thomas Ap Catesby Jones from command of the Pacific squadron; which was read.

Mr. WISE said he hoped his colleague would not press his resolution. No communication had been received from Commodore Jones, owing to the distance of his station from the seat of Government; and he therefore hoped that the House would wait to hear from the Pacific. The department has, as he felt assured, taken no action in the matter.

Mr. BOTTS said he would willingly withdraw his resolution, if his colleague were right. He was induced to offer it, in consequence of the statement in the Globe of this morning, in relation to the alleged recall of Commodore Jones.

Mr. WISE said there was no truth in the rumor stated in the Globe—no foundation whatever for it.

Mr. BOTTS was understood to say that he was under the impression that Captain Parker was ordered to take the place of Commodore Jones.

Mr. WISE remarked that he saw Capt. Parker on yesterday, and that officer said that he had not been ordered to the Pacific at all. He felt certain that no such course as that supposed by his colleague had been taken with regard to Commodore Jones.

Here the subject dropped.

The House then resumed the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WINTHROP,] to print 5,000 extra copies of the majority and minority report from the Committee on Commerce, in relation to the imprisonment of negro seamen in Southern ports. The question was taken, and the motion adopted.

The motion to print 3,000 extra copies of the report upon the commerce of the lakes, heretofore submitted, was adopted.

GEN. JACKSON'S FINE.

This subject came up as the regular business of the morning hour—the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS being entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOTTS rose and inquired how much of the hour remained.

The SPEAKER said, twelve to fifteen minutes.

Mr. BOTTS said if the House had no objection, he would defer his remarks until Monday.

No objection being made, the subject was passed by.

Mr. GIDDINGS here called for the orders of the day, but yielded his call.

EXTRA ALLOWANCES.

Mr. C. JOHNSON asked the House, by general consent, to take up his bill to prohibit extra allowances to public officers.

No objection having been made, the bill was read as follows:

A BILL to prohibit extra allowances to any officer of the Government.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful for the President of the United States, or either of the heads of departments, or any disbursing officer of the United States, to settle, allow, or pay to any officer of the Government, or to any person in the pay or employment of the Government, any additional compensation or allowance, or extra pay, or per centum whatever, in addition to the regular pay of such officer, or other person, for or on account of any services, of whatever nature or kind they may be; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. C. JOHNSON submitted an amendment, the object of which, he said, was to carry out more effectually the provisions of the bill. It provided that it shall be the duty of the President to remove any officer who should be found guilty of violating its provisions.

Mr. ADAMS opposed the bill, and contended that it would be likely to increase, rather than reduce, the public expenditures. Its effect was to prohibit officers from performing extra services; the consequence of which would be, the appointment of new and additional officers. He argued that extra services were often required of the military and naval officers, for which they should be paid.

Mr. CUSHING wished to know whether this bill had the absolute right to be considered this day.

The SPEAKER said that the bill was under consideration by consent.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. CUSHING said it seemed to him that this was one of those bills which demanded the consideration of some committee; and he would, therefore, move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PICKENS understood that this bill, as amended by the gentleman who introduced it, limited the power of the President in regard to dismissal from office; which he deemed unconstitutional. [Mr. P. was here informed that the amendment was withdrawn.] Mr. P. had no doubt but the power of making extra allowances had been greatly abused; but he doubted whether the House would not do more harm than good by prohibiting it altogether. He had no objection to a declaratory clause, which would point out the abuses which ought to be corrected.

Mr. CUSHING then withdrew his motion, and moved to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GILMER was afraid that, if the bill was referred to any committee, it would not be passed this session; and he thought it indispensable to the preservation of a pure government, or the restoration of a pure government, that some such measure should be adopted. The gentleman from Massachusetts seemed to him not to have met the bill in the true spirit. It was very true, in the abstract, that there were extra services which would entitle the persons performing them to an equitable claim on the Government for extra compensation; but if the gentleman would refer to the facts shown in the report of a committee of this House at the last session, he would find that these extra compensations, which have grown up into such an alarming abuse, were not paid for extra services, but for the ordinary services which the Government had a right to demand of the officers receiving them. Now, he would grant, with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that if the Chief Justice should be required to take the command of the army, or render any service which the people of the United States had not a right to require from him, then he would be entitled to claim extra compensation for it. So also, if the commander-in-chief of the army of the United States was required to perform any civil duty not within the line of his official duties, then he would be entitled to claim an extra allowance for it. But the fact was, that soldiers had been allowed extra compensation for performing a soldier's duty, and civilians had been allowed extra compensation for performing their civil duties; and that was the great evil they wished to correct. The practice also of granting extra compensation comprehended too much discretion in the executive departments, and allowed them to fix the compensations of the public officers, which ought only to be done by Congress. There were no officers in the public service whose duties were not prescribed by law; and he maintained that the Government had a right to demand all their time, within the line of their duty, as an equivalent for the liberal salaries allowed them. If they rendered any extra services deserving of extra compensation, Congress was the place to apply for it. Why should the bill be referred either to the Committee on Military Affairs, or to the Committee of the Whole? The House had, by a full vote, discharged the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of it; and it was now before them, and open to amendment. All the members of the committees were members of the House; and they could discuss and amend the bill as well in the House as in the committee-rooms. If they had amendments to offer, now was the time to do it. He hoped the reference would not be made, as a delay of the bill would probably defeat it for this session. It was necessary for a pure and honest Government that some such regulation should be adopted. There had been the most flagrant and outrageous abuses in making extra allowances to officers for performing merely the ordinary duties of their stations, in violation of law; for he would observe, that such a prohibition as was contained in this bill was already on the statute-book. The passage of this bill, therefore, would show the departments that the attention of the Representatives of the people was turned to the subject, and that they were determined to correct the abuses complained of.

Mr. HOLMES supposed that, with the exception of two or three enlightened minds, there were not ten persons in the House who had given any consideration to this bill; and yet they were in this hasty manner called on to do—what? Why, to correct abuses which, as the gentleman who introduced the bill said, had existed since the foundation of the Government. Now, he took this ground: that there ought to be no legislation for the purpose of reforming long-standing abuses, without reflecting deeply on the evils that might thereby be produced. Without any correspondence with the heads of departments, but by the consultation of two or three members together, who were for curing all the evils existing in the Government, they were called, in this hurried manner, to legislate in the dark, without knowing what the evils were that were complained of, and without knowing whether the cure would be effectual.

Mr. TILLINGHAST opposed the bill as conflicting with existing laws, and as tending to put it out of the power of the Government to make compensation for services that may be rendered, and that may be indispensable for the carrying on of the Government.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL said that the passage of the bill would present a very extraordinary instance of inconsistency on the part of Congress. They had now before them a bill just passed by the Senate, providing extra compensation for the officers who were engaged in the exploring expedition; and while they were considering this bill, (which had passed one body, and would no doubt pass the other,) they were asked to pass another, prohibiting all extra compensations whatever, no matter how meritorious and indispensable the service that might be rendered. Mr. I. dwelt on the important services rendered by the officers of the exploring expedition, and the privations they en-consulered, for the purpose of showing that, in these cases, as well as similar ones, extra compensation was both just and necessary.

After a few words on the mode in which this subject had been brought up, he advocated its committal to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRANGER gave some reasons for voting with the ultras in the House on this bill. He had opposed the reduction of the army and the navy, which the gentlemen who supported this bill had effected; but, during a long peace, a system had grown up in this Government, of making extra allowances; and a feeling had arisen through the community, in consequence, of hostility to the army and the navy, which were the glory and pride of the nation. Now, he advocated this bill for the purpose of sustaining the army and the navy from further reductions; and he ventured to assert, that if some such bill had been in existence before, the reductions which had taken place in het army and navy would not have been made.

Mr. C. BROWN hoped the House would not be prejudiced against this bill by the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL] respecting the mode in which it came before them. The bill was there, and it was entitled to as much consideration as if it had been reported with all the formalities of the House. Of the bill itself, he said it was worthy of their attention. This House, with the other branches of the Legislature, fixed the pay for the officers of the army and of the navy, and also of the clerks in the departments; and they had given power to the heads of departments to allow extra compensation; and who did not know that favoritism existed, and that the power which they had delegated to others had been wrongfully used? What was the remedy for this? A very plain one. Let no officer receive more than his pay for services which he may render; but if he did more than was contemplated when the pay was fixed, let him come to Congress with his claim, like the officers of the exploring expedition, and there would always be found justice enough to pay him for his extra services.

Mr. MOORE said this subject had been sufficiently discussed at the last session, and therefore he moved the previous question.

Mr. ARNOLD appealed to the gentleman to withdraw that motion, to give him an opportunity to say a single word.

The motion was not withdrawn, and the previous question was seconded, which had the effect of bringing the House to a direct vote on the engrossment of the bill. The bill was ordered to be engrossed; and the question recurred on its third reading.

Mr. MOORE moved the previous question, which was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered on the passage of the bill, and resulted as follows—yeas 151, nays 15.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. ARNOLD said he rose to a privileged question. He believed such was the only question on which he could get the floor. He moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill had been passed. He had appealed to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOORE] to withdraw the motion for the previous question, in order to enable him to offer an amendment to the bill; and that gentleman, though often in favor of retrenchment, and though he knew what he (Mr. A) intended to offer, refused to accord him the privilege of making an amendment.

Mr. GIDDINGS suggested that the gentleman should postpone his remarks until Monday, and let the House act on the private bills before it.

Mr. ARNOLD expressed his willingness to speak at some other time; but several gentlemen objected to a postponement of the motion to reconsider, and he was obliged to go on at this time.

Mr. MOORE explained the reasons why he had refused to withdraw the motion for the previous question. He could not have served the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ARNOLD] by so doing; because the engrossment of the bill had been ordered, and it was not liable to amendment.

Mr. ARNOLD resumed, and addressed the House for some time in favor of his bill for reducing the pay of members of Congress and officers of the Government 25 per cent., which bill was proposed at the last session, and referred to the Committee of the Whole, and never acted on. He complained that he could not make a motion to take it up, without being laughed at; this, too, when the people in the country called aloud for the adoption of some such measure of retrenchment. He desired to have the passage of the bill just passed reconsidered, for the purpose of attaching his proposition to it as an amendment. He argued that it would reduce the expenditures of the Government four millions annually; and he complained that the Whig party, of which he had been proud to be a member, had not fulfilled their pledges of retrenchment and reform so profusely made in every portion of the Union.

Mr. STANLY made a few remarks, the purport of which was to correct a statement of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] that the credit of his having accomplished a reduction of the army at the late session was due to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. C. JOHNSON.] He held that all the credit of that measure (if any could be claimed) belonged to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS.]

Mr. C. JOHNSON said he had always so acknowledged.

The previous question was then moved and seconded; and, on putting the main question to the House, the motion to reconsider was rejected without a division.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The House took up the bill for the relief of the inhabitants of West Florida; which was made the special order for to-day, and on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had the floor.

Mr. ADAMS addressed the House at some length in opposition to the bill, and concluded by moving to lay it on the table; but, at the earnest request of Mr. LEVY, withdrew the motion, to allow that gentleman an opportunity of being heard in explanation, and in favor of the bill.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS offered a resolution (which was adopted) calling on the Secretary of War to report whether any change had been made in the organization of the military divisions of the army of the United States since March 1st, 1842; and if so, the reasons for such change.

Mr. BRIGGS offered a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for a report showing the operation of the late tariff act on the revenue; which was adopted.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 23, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, showing the names of the persons employed in that department during the year 1842; which, on motion by Mr. ARCHER, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, a communication from the same department, in compliance with the 20th section of the act of 1842, showing the manner in which the contingent fund of that department has been expended; and showing the amount of all former appropriations remaining in the treasury, and in the hands of disbursing agents, to the 30th June, 1842: ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, in relation to depredations made on the live-oak timber belonging to the United States, and pointing out measures proper to be adopted to prevent future destruction of such timber; which, on motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law. Mr. T. remarked that the letter accompanying the memorial showed that the latter was signed by most influential and wealthy men of large capital, engaged in most extensive business operations; and whose pursuits gave them full opportunity to acquire a practical knowledge of the operations of that law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from James Smith, praying the establishment of a new department of government, to be called the Department of Agriculture, to take charge of the agricultural interest; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, presented a memorial from citizens of Missouri, residing in the Jackson land district, in that State, praying the removal of the land office from Jackson to Fredericktown; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a petition from inhabitants in the south-eastern part of Missouri, praying an appropriation for the survey and improvement of Spring and Grand rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVANS presented a memorial from citizens of Bangor, in the State of Maine, praying the adoption of measures for placing the navigating interests of the United States on a more equal footing with those of foreign powers, than is secured by existing treaties; and

Mr. BATES presented a similar memorial from Gershom B. Nestor, and others, of Massachusetts; which memorials were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ARCHER presented a memorial adopted at a meeting of citizens of Ohio county, Virginia, asking Congress to make a large issue of public stocks, based on a pledge of the public lands, for the relief of the States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented three memorials from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, asking Congress to adopt the plan for a board of exchequer; which were ordered to lie on the table, to be considered with the bill on that subject.

Also, presented a petition from James Gee, a soldier of the late was, who has received a pension for wounds received in the service of his country, asking Congress for certain arrears of pension from the time he was disabled to the time at which he received a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, presented a memorial from Edward Dexter, of Providence, Rhode Island, praying indemnity for the capture of the schooner Betsy by the French privateer Cisalpine, prior to 1800.

Mr. B. said this was one of the cases arising under the treaty of 1800; and moved that it lie on the table, as a bill had been reported making indemnity for such claims: agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK presented certain resolutions adopted by the Board of Common Council of the City of Washington, on the subject of the cession to the State of Maryland of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial signed by 3,000 inhabitants of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, in which they express the opinion that the sectional floating dry-dock is superior to any other, and praying that a dry-dock of that description be erected at Brooklyn: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial from a number of respectable citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, complaining of the deranged state of the currency, and suggesting that the plan for a board of exchequer would furnish some means of relief: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WOODBURY presented additional documents in relation to the claim of Robert Rodgers to a tract of land; which, with the memorial on the subject now on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CHOATE presented a memorial from Robert G. Shaw and others, of Boston, praying that there may be such an alteration of our treaty stipulations with foreign governments, as to secure a more reciprocal trade: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, presented a memorial from Daniel Weed and 26 others, of Massachusetts, praying that the constitutional rights of colored seamen, citizens of free States, may be restored to them: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, in favor of the adoption of the plan for a board of exchequer; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALKER remarked that the Judiciary Committee, a few days ago, had instructed him to make a report adverse to the passage of the bill from the House for the relief of Gorham A. Worth. Since that report was made, new evidence and documents have been developed. They did not change his mind as to the propriety of rejecting the bill; but it was due that the committee should have an opportunity of reconsidering their former decision, if there should be found anything in this new evidence to justify it. He, therefore, moved that the bill be taken up, with a view to its recommitment to the Judiciary Committee.

The question was put, and carried in the affirmative; and the bill was referred accordingly.

Mr. CONRAD presented a memorial from H. J. Ramsay and others, purchasers of public lands in the State of Louisiana, asking for relief in consequence of the patents for the same being withheld: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KERR presented a memorial from the city of Baltimore, signed by a number of large commission merchants, protesting in a solemn manner against the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. YOUNG presented a memorial from inhabitants of township No. 41 north, of range 7, east of the 3d principal meridian, in Kane county, Illinois, praying for the relinquishment of the sixteenth sections of land reserved for school purposes, and the selection of other lands in lieu thereof; which was ordered to lie on the table—a general bill for the object prayed for having already passed the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and favorably to its passage, the joint resolution from the House, to establish agencies for water-rotted hemp in the States of Kentucky and Missouri.

Mr. CONRAD, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with an amendment, House bill entitled "An act for the relief of James B. Sullivan, of the parish of Rapides, in the State of Louisiana."

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, made a report (which was ordered to be printed) in favor of the indefinite postponement of the bill from the House, entitled "An act for the relief of Benjamin Evans."

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, made a report (which was ordered to be printed) adverse to the passage of the bill from the House, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Neely."

Also, reported back, from the same committee, with sundry amendments, the bill for the relief of Samuel M. Asbury.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, reporting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 28th ultimo, statements of the revenue from imports during the third and fourth quarters of the year 1842; the outstanding appropriations at the close of the years 1840, 1841, and 1842, respectively; and the quantity of land advertised for sale since the 4th March, 1840; which, on motion of Mr. WOODBURY, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

The resolution of Mr. SEVIER, so to amend the 33d rule of the Senate as to authorize the appointment of a new standing committee to take charge of Territorial business, came up for consideration.

Mr. SEVIER made some remarks in favor of the resolution, not distinctly heard.

Mr. KING said he had no disposition to throw any obstacle in the way of the business of the Territories; but it struck his mind that there could no great advantage result from the passage of the resolution. The Territories had their delegates in the other House, who were pleased to attend to the interests of the Territories, and to take such measures as were proper to advance them, both before the House and the standing committee having charge of that class of business. He thought, so far as speedy action in the Senate was desirable, that greater facility would be given by the several standing committees of that body to Territorial business, than could in all human probability be given by a regular and independent committee. He had no great objection to the adoption of the resolution, but thought it better for the Territories that it should not be.

Mr. SEVIER thought that there were many local matters which might be better or more promptly attended to, if there was a regular standing committee. He saw no reason why the Territories were not equally entitled as the District of Columbia to an exclusive committee. He hoped the resolution would be adopted.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. KING presented a memorial from a number of ship-owners of Newburyport, Massachusetts, representing that the mercantile navigation of the United States has suffered materially from the effects of the existing treaties, and the arrangements between the United States and Great Britain, the Hanseatic Republics, France, Holland Denmark, Russia, and Sweden, respectively; and that those treaties and arrangements termed reciprocal have not proved reciprocal to the navigation of the United States. Mr. K. said the memorialists to asked that Congress would, so far as the treaties permitted, make such regulations as would relieve them from the consequences resulting from these relations. Mr. K. had no doubt that the shipping interests of the United States had been impaired by a desire to extend reciprocal commercial relations. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LINN expressed a wish that the Senate would take up the Oregon bill, as the member from Kentucky, who was entitled to the floor on it, was ready to proceed in his remarks.

Mr. EVANS hoped the Senate would dispose of the unfinished business of Friday—being the bill for the benefit of the Petersburg Railroad Company.

Some debate of a conversational character here arose on the priority of business. Messrs. EVANS and GRAHAM contending that the Petersburg railroad bill should have precedence; and Messrs. LINN and SEVIER, that the Oregon bill should.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed a hope that the bill for the benefit of the railroad company would be taken up and disposed of; for, if it was intended to be of any benefit at all, it should be passed forthwith.

Mr. BATES moved to take up the railroad bill; and the question being put on that motion, it was determined in the affirmative—ayes 18, noes 17.

PETERSBURG RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. ARCHER said he would have had great occasion to regret having yielded to the wishes of the Senator from Arkansas for an adjournment, when this subject was last before the Senate, if it had failed to come up for discussion to-day; for it was a subject of very great importance, not only to the parties who were to be immediately benefited by it, but to the community at large. He would, nevertheless, have been contented to intrust those interests, great as they were, to the care of other gentlemen in that body, were it not for the relation in which he stood to the parties, and for the observations made on a former day by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] The Senator from Pennsylvania had, in his apprehension, given a sufficient evidence of the untenableness of the grounds upon which the passage of this bill was attempted to be resisted, when he (evincing, as he did, the utmost solicitude about the fate of the bill) opened the debate by making that sort of appeal to the Senate which the gentlemen of his party always reserve as the ultima ratio—as the reason which should ride over all other considerations. The gentleman declared this to be one of those cases (to which allusion was so often made) of moneyed institutions successfully struggling to supersede all considerations of the public interest, or of public faith. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was a man of letters, and a man of taste; he knew too well the Horatian rule to fail in the observance of it.

He (Mr. ARCHER) desired to call the attention of the Senate to what had been made the subject of anticipated invective. This corporation was one which was instituted for a great agricultural purpose, affecting not one portion alone, but several portions of this Union. The gentleman's own State was largely interested, as well as that which he (Mr. A.) had the honor to represent. Nor was this all. This road was subservient to the communication along the whole seaboard of the United States, and vitally affected the interests of all the maritime States of the Union—such were the interests involved in this question, and not merely those of the party claiming relief by this bill. And what was the nature of the benefits to be conferred by the bill upon the party who were applicants for its passage? Did they ask a remission of duties to be granted them, to which they were not now entitled? Not at all. The iron was already in the country, or would be within a few days; and all they asked was, an extension of the time for laying it down.

Even the laying down of the iron might be completed in time; but, if they were driven, by a denial of their request—by a refusal to pass this bill—to go on within the limits of the period which remained to them under the present law, what would be the result to the parties and to the community? The parties would be compelled, impoverished as they now were, to employ labor at any cost, in order to complete their work within the given time. This would be attended with considerable inconvenience to the company; but it was not the company alone which was going to be affected. A portion of the great Southern road, upwards of a hundred miles in extent, would have to be taken up; and the communication along this great artery, which connects the North with the South, suspended for the period of a whole month. The parties asked no remission of duties; but they asked a remission of expense, and for an indulgence, which, if conferred, would avert from the public the highest inconvenience.

Associated wealth! corporations! Why, the company asking this indulgence was nearly bankrupt. He (Mr. A.) had asked one of the presidents of the company at what price his stock was selling, and his answer was, "At no price." The company was largely indebted to the State. And such were the moneyed corporations which, according to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, were sure to obtain from Congress whatever they might ask. He denied the very ground on which the Senator planted himself. The privilege now asked had nothing to do with the question of favoring the iron-manufacturing interests. The iron manufacturers of Pennsylvania would not sell one pound more of iron if this bill should be rejected, than they would if it were passed. There was no ground, then, on which the gentleman's opposition could rest. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania had spoken of his conciliatory disposition. Did he not perceive how much he was now acting out of that character—to which he (Mr. A.) would readily agree he was generally entitled—for he was asking at the hands of the Senate for a most vindictive action on this subject. He was asking for a subjection of the interests of the whole maritime frontier to—what? The honorable Senator had told them—and he (Mr. A.) asked the particular attention of the Senate to this point—The honorable Senator had told them that a great company had been recently established upon the Alleghany river, for the manufacturing of railroad iron. So all these sacrifices were invoked by the honorable Senator—for whose benefit? For the benefit of one single iron manufacturing establishment in his own State. This was his notion of justice. He (Mr. ARCHER) supposed that the interests of these corporations, to which the honorable Senator was so hostile—corporations which subserve agriculture and commerce—were to be sacrificed; and to what? Why, to the interests of another corporation—an iron manufacturing company in Pennsylvania.

When the discussion in which they had been involved in relation to our protective policy upon the passage of the tariff bill was going on, what was the appeal then made to them? What was the design of the gentleman who made that appeal, in relation to the protection of the interests of the country? Was it that new interests were to be built up? Or was it not rather that the old and established interests of the country should be protected? At that time there were none of these establishments for the manufacturing of iron for railroads in existence.

The gentleman, then, in invoking protection for these iron establishments, was not borne out by the policy heretofore avowed. Protection was intended to be extended to the old and existing institutions. There was scarcely a man on this floor, or, indeed, anywhere—certainly not south of the Potomac—who would have dared to avow the doctrine that it was intended that new interests should be generated. But admitting it to be otherwise—that we were bound not to sacrifice a new interest, or a new industry that had recently sprung up;—admitting the full force of the arguments of his honorable friend, still they would have no application to this case. It could be no breach of that protective policy, admitting it to extend to the company whose interests were advocated by the honorable Senator, to say to the Petersburg company, If you do not transcend the time limited for making importations, you shall have the privilege of laying down your iron when you please. The true intendment was a limit upon the time for importation. As to the laying down of the iron, it was wholly unimportant: it had no reference to the real policy of the protection of the manufacturing interests of the country.

The limitation of the time for laying down the iron stood merely in the relation of a penalty; and inferior courts of justice often remit penalties where the substance of the obligations is fulfilled. If a court of law were to enforce the penalty, the court of chancery would interfere. Congress was the highest court of justice and of equity. Here was a penalty, the application of which was to enure to the benefit of no one. They were enforcing a penalty in a case which was not reached by the policy of our protective tariff. It would be a sanctioning on their part of the vindictive penalty; and he submitted to the honorable Senator whether his claim to the character of conciliator would not be endangered by his strenuous advocacy of this vindictive action. It would not only not enure to any public benefit, but it would be productive of no sort of benefit to the iron-manufacturing company in Pennsylvania, which was the only establishment now manufacturing that sort of iron in the United States. There should, he thought, be no hesitation on the question.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he believed this to be a bill of great importance, and calculated, in its effects, to repeal the policy of the late tariff law, in reference to a single article, without a modification of the whole of it. He wished to present to the Senate his views upon this subject, and he would do it as briefly as possible. He had no interest in this bill, which was not common to every Senator. His honorable friend was mistaken if he supposed that he argued that, because there were one or two establishments for the making of railroad iron in Pennsylvania, that was a reason for the rejection of this bill. He had stated the fact merely for the information of the Senate, and for no other purpose. Still, it was important information, and well worthy the attention of the country. The Senator said he (Mr. BUCHANAN) was well acquainted with the Horatian rule. He presumed the rule the Senator referred to was, that he never asked the interposition of the gods, unless in a difficulty otherwise insuperable. But if he should succeed in representing to the Senate his ideas upon this subject, he thought the Senator would agree with him that there was no insuperable difficulty in the case.

It appeared to him a perfectly plain case; and notwithstanding the Senator from South Carolina thought it was unworthy of argument, he doubted whether he would be able to succeed in refuting even the feeble arguments which he would be able to present. He asserted that corporations had great power in this country. They were never satisfied. One decision against them might follow another; and they were always ready, like the heads of the hydra, to spring up to new life, and persist in urging their claims upon Congress. If ever a question had been settled on broad, and liberal, and just principles, he contended it was this question, so far as corporations were concerned. Let them look at this case, and they would see the respectable Committee on Finance reporting a bill, without a line accompanying that report for the benefit of a corporation.

If a poor old soldier applied for a pension, the question was, in every instance, referred to a committee; and the case was presented to the Senate in an ample and full report. The Senate could not tell now how much iron was to be laid down; they could not even tell the length of the road that was to be relaid; or how much had already been laid down; they could not tell whether they were to release to the company the payment of $50,000 or $500. They had the naked statement of the company, which conveyed no authentic information on the subject.

Mr. B. proceeded to review the history of the legislative enactments in reference to this company, and argued that the exclusive privileges granted to it had already occasioned the tax upon the community to be increased to a very great extent. And now the question was, whether a second exemption from the payment of duties, to which all other citizens were subject, should be extended to this railroad company; for so far from its being a mere extension of the time for laying down the iron, it would in reality be a further release of duties. He was far from being an enemy to corporations whose purposes, objects, and views were for the public advantage. He was far from being an enemy to railroad corporations; he believed they had been of much service to the country. But as to the influence exerted by corporations, it was plainly visible. The Oregon Territory bill was laid aside; the question involving peace or war was laid aside, in order that this measure should pass, and that the railroad company should be put to no inconvenience. When he asserted that corporations had influence, he was borne out by the facts before them. Did they not see respectable men associated together in the form of a company, having an object to accomplish, bringing respectable men from Virginia to advocate and support their interests? They could, and did, urge their claims with more impunity, and with greater pertinacity, and with better success, than individual citizens. He did think, when he had consented in 1841 and 1842 to yield to their demands, that we should have heard no more of railroad companies' exemptions from the common burdens borne by the citizens of this country. If they should succeed in passing this bill, it would be, as he said before, but the entering wedge, so far as regards Pennsylvania and Kentucky, and the other iron producing States. Whether the tariff be right or wrong, (and he was not going to discuss that question)—whether the principle of protection be of benefit or not—it was a general enactment, designed to have a general application; and he regarded it as highly improper and inexpedient to fritter away that law by special legislation.

Mr. RIVES said he desired to make a single observation in regard to the point upon which the Senator from Pennsylvania seemed to lay all the emphasis, viz: that here was an application for exemption from the duty on iron, to which exemption the company asking it was not entitled, according to the equitable construction of the law. It seemed to him (Mr. R.) that the construction given to the law by the honorable Senator was altogether too liberal, and that it did not satisfy the equity of the case.

Mr. RIVES here read the provision of the statute which applies to the laying down of the iron necessary to complete the road previous to the 3d March, 1843. It appeared to him, from the facts presented in the memorial of the Petersburg company, that the road never had been completed, and that the Senator from Pennsylvania was therefore incorrect in supposing that the intention was to renew the exemption heretofore enjoyed. The company, it appeared, had procured, in the first instance, very light iron, which, when laid down, was discovered to be entirely unsuitable; and they were consequently under the necessity of ordering a new importation. The iron had not been worn out: it was not, therefore, for the purpose of replacing old rails by new, but of substituting good rails for those which had been mistakenly supposed to be sufficient. It seemed to him that this circumstance, instead of diminishing the weight of reasoning in favor of the passage of the bill, added to it, in a very considerable degree; because the company had been subjected to a double hardship, and had incurred considerable loss. He thought that, in a fair, practical, and equitable view of the case, it came clearly within the spirit, if not directly within the letter, of the law.

Mr. EVANS was very sorry to be under the necessity of saying another word on this subject. But, as he was obliged to do so, he would confine himself to one or two remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] which, he conceived, applied to the only question that could arise as to the propriety or policy of the present bill. The first point relied upon by the Senator is, that this is a bill, not simply for extending the time for laying down iron imported under the provisions of the tariff law, but to release the iron imported by the company up to the 3d of March, for its railroad, from duty altogether; or, in other words, to make a donation of $50,000 to this company; because, as he says, its iron is not entitled to the exemption from duty, according to the letter and spirit of the provision in the tariff law. He thinks we are giving to this company privileges which do not belong to it under existing law. This argument has been answered in part by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] with whom he (Mr. E.) concurred. The law of 1841 allowed all railroad iron imported previous to 3d March, 1843, to come in duty free, and to remain exempt from duty, provided it was laid down before that day for use, where it is intended for the construction or completion of railroads in the course of construction. By the tariff law of 1842, railroad iron imported and laid down for use up to the 3d of March, 1843, is exempt from duty; but, because this provision refers to the law of 1841, which it is intended to carry out, the Senator insists that it is confined to new railroads, new branches, or parts in construction, and not before complete. He contends that this railroad is not one entitled to the privilege, because iron was laid down upon it before. But the Senator overlooks the fact that this company was only trying an experiment, not knowing the extent of business or weight of transport which might be required; and, indeed, at first not anticipating anything like what has come to pass; and imported iron, which, on trial, proved entirely too light. It proved so unfit for the use of the road, that the company has, for a few years back, been devoting its means to the object of replacing this light iron with a more substantial and permanent kind. Until this is fully accomplished, the road is not complete; and in spirit, if not in letter, it is entitled to the privilege of the law of 1841, recognised in the law of 1842. Another answer to the objection made by the Senator is, that the act of 1842 extended the provision of the act of 1841 to all railroad iron imported and laid down for use prior to 3d March, 1843; and, although the words "entitled under any existing law" are used, it does not exclude the construction that iron for repairs of railroads may not be imported duty free, according to the spirit and meaning of the law of 1842. The Senator says there was no existing law which entitled this company to import iron for its railroad, without payment of duty, to replace iron already in use that had before been imported duty free. If that is the construction of the proviso in the law of 1842, this bill will not affect it. But, the Senator will say, Why pass it, then, if it will be of no avail? It is precisely because the friends of the bill think it will avail, and because they put a different construction on the law of 1842, that they wish to pass it. They wish to pass it, because, while it inflicts no injury on the revenue, (for it can make no difference in that particular,) it will give not only great convenience to the operations of the company, but confer a public benefit on the country, and its mails and commerce, by preventing an unnecessary interruption and suspension, for an indefinite period, of the intercourse of travel by that route of railroad.

The Committee on Finance had considered all these things. It found that the iron was here, and would and could be laid down by the 3d of March, if this indulgence was not granted; that, therefore, it would make no difference to the revenue. They construed the provision of the law of 1842 in the spirit on which that law was based; and, taking care that the period of importing the iron duty free should not be extended, they conceived it reasonable to extend the time for laying down that already imported. He was aware that, in one sense, it might be said the time of importation will be extended, because, without this bill, no iron would be imported past a day which would allow time for laying it down prior to 3d of March; and that iron imported on the 2d of March might be duty free, while that imported next day would be subject to duty. But the law was so; and the committee did not propose any modification of it, well knowing that, practically, there would be no such importation up to the day. In fact, all the iron ordered under that provision of the law, is either in the country, wholly or in the greater part—with the exception, perhaps, of some few tons in port, and not yet landed; though he did not know that there was any ordered not by this time received. The bill proposes merely to allow the company till December next for laying down this railroad iron. It does not prolong the time for importation. It makes no difference to the revenue. It will, besides being some convenience and saving of expense to the company, be of great convenience and saving of time, if not of expense, to the Government in continuing, uninterrupted, the transmission of the mails; and, in general, to the public at large, interested in the travel or commerce of the South.

Mr. BAYARD asked whether the bill would have reference merely to the iron already in the country, or to all that may be imported up to the 3d of March?

Mr. EVANS replied that it would extend to iron imported up to the 3d of March; but there would be none so imported beyond what would come in duty free, even if the bill was not passed. The existing law goes to the same extent; and the committee did not think proper to make any alteration, fully impressed with the conviction that there would be no importation under this bill, that would not take place under the law of 1842.

The debate was continued by Messrs. ARCHER and EVANS in support of the bill, and by Messrs. BUCHANAN and PHELPS in opposition.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and it was passed—yeas 20, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Berrien, Calhoun, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Evans, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Kerr, King, McDuffie, Mangum, Merrick, Rives, Sevier, Walker, Woodbridge, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Linn, McRoberts, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wilcox, Williams, and Woodbury—19.

Several communications from the President of the United States were then read and ordered to be printed.

Among them was one in reply to Mr. RIVES's resolution adopted a few days ago, calling for the correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain on the subject of the burning of the Caroline; which correspondence the Secretary of State transmitted to the Senate, as desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tem laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, reports from the State and War Departments, touching the possession of the Oregon Territory. The Secretary of State, in his communication, remarks, that a letter from Thomas J. Farnham, of January 4, 1840, appears to have been transmitted to that department by the Secretary of War in the month of May following; and that on the 6th of the same month a letter was transmitted to the American minister in London, with extracts from that communication. As the President was desirous of knowing whether the intelligence contained in Mr. Farnham's letter, relative to large grants by the British Government to the Hudson Bay Company, of a large and valuable tract of land in the Oregon Territory, and of supposed grants and sales of those lands by that company to individuals, was well-founded, the minister was instructed to make application to the proper quarter for information on the subject. In presenting the matter to the British Government, he was assured that no such grant of land had been made to the Hudson Bay Company, and that the only grant which had been made to that company was a grant of exclusive trade with the Indians in certain parts of North America for a further term of twenty-one years, on the surrender of the former grant.

The communication was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The unfinished debate on the passage of the Oregon bill was then resumed.

Mr. MOREHEAD, being entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate for upwards of an hour. He advocated the passage of the bill in its present form, and maintained that the United States should either take this step now, or submit to the loss of the territory. He showed that the provision objected to by other Senators—that of promising a grant of land to settlers—did not conflict with our obligations under the treaty, as Great Britain never had denied our undisputed right to some territory in Oregon. There was not one step proposed to be taken in this bill, that we were not fully justified in taking by the construction of the treaty on which Great Britain had heretofore acted, and was at the present moment acting.

He reviewed, in detail, the progress of the British settlements on the Columbia, from the time of the breaking up of Mr. Astor's settlements to the present period, and showed that the whole policy of England was to encourage a British population there, as the exclusive possessors of the soil, under the calculation that, when numerous enough, that population would decide in favor of putting the country exclusively under British dominion. So unrestrained and rapid was her advance to this consummation, that, if it was not averted by the passage of this bill, no future legislation on our part could regain our lost ground.

Mr. McROBERTS, in order to show that England's claim to any portion of the Territory of Oregon was of recent date, read from the parliamentary debates on the subject of the treaty of Nootka Sound, the arguments of the ablest British statesmen of that day, and the admissions of the then ministry of England, that, instead of gaining anything by that treaty, Great Britain had lost whatever dubious claims she might have previously had to joint occupation with Spain south of Nootka Sound, and was restricted in her right of fishing and trading to the country north of Nootka Sound.

On motion of Mr. WOODBURY,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 23, 1843.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of William A. Palmer and 26 others, for the establishment of a mail route from Jonesborough, in the county of Washington, Maine, to Palmer (so called) in the town of Machias, in said county; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHN C. EDWARDS presented the petition of James Thomas, Judith Moss, and Claiborne Thomas, praying an appropriation of land scrip to supply a deficit of ten per cent., allowed to revolutionary claimants under an act of 1835: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FILLMORE asked the indulgence of the House to enable him to make a personal explanation in reference to himself and the Committee of Ways and Means. As long as he had been a member of the House, he had never, on any occasion prior to this time, felt it his duty to notice any newspaper article in reference to his own conduct individually, or the conduct of those with whom he was associated. Nevertheless, there had been brought to his notice an editorial article that was published in the Union, a leading administration paper of the city of New York, under date of Saturday, January 21, 1843, reflecting so grossly on him and the Committee of Ways and Means, that he felt it to be his duty to notice it. He would send the paper to the Clerk's table, that it might be read for the information of the House. Mr. F. then handed up the following to the Clerk's table; and it was read by the Clerk:

"THE INFAMY OF FACTION.—One of the most infamous acts of faction in the plenitude of its power ever perpetrated took place at the Capitol of the United States the day before the Committee of Ways and Means reported on the subject of the exchequer bill.

"It had been ascertained that a majority of the more liberal and discreet Whigs were in favor of the exchequer scheme recommended by the Executive; and it was further ascertained that it was very probable that the Committee of Ways and Means would report in favor of the bill brought forward by Mr. Cushing. These facts having reached the ears of the leaders of the Clay faction, a caucus was ordered and holden, and went into operation the night before the report of the committee was made.

"At the opening of the caucus, it was plain that the majority of the Whigs present, weary of waging a reckless, unprofitable, and infamous opposition to the people's will, had determined to go forth like men, and sustain the President and the exchequer.

"At this stage of the affair, the leaders took their stand, and commenced a furious attack on the President and the Administration, and denounced them both; and having got up much excitement, they avowed that, if any man as a Whig gave the least countenance to the plan of the President, he would be a traitor to his party; and, as such, should be presented to his country.

"Still many of the more discreet and liberal Whigs manifested a disposition to sustain the exchequer, and to do something to relieve the embarrassments of the nation.

"At this stage of the game, a letter from Mr. Clay was brought forward and read. In that most precious document, he urged that it was the duty and policy of the Whigs to defeat the exchequer, and leave the country to suffer. 'Let the people feel,' said the writer of the letter adroitly; 'let them suffer: and, casting the responsibility of the act on the shoulders of the President as they will, they will soon become outrageous, and blight the vast hopes of his ascendency. But, if you give them an exchequer, it may relieve them somewhat; it may afford something of that pecuniary aid they seek, and the Whigs will be divested of the capital they work upon.' Such was the substance, if not the very letter, of the epistle; and it was not without its effect. A long and animated debate ensued; and, finally, the question was taken by yeas and nays. It was not known what was the exact vote; but it is known that the minority was very strong, and that the majority in favor of instructing in caucus the Committee of Ways and Means to report against the exchequer did not exceed four votes.

"A majority obtained, after everything like argument, menace, and denunciation had been exhausted; and Mr. Clay's white Charlies defeated the exchequer bill in caucus, bound in chains one of the most important standing committees of the national Congress, and deprived the nation of an opportunity of even discussing a bill, in the fate of which the happiness, the interests, and the future splendor of the whole nation, are involved.

"If the exchequer bill had not been defeated by the caucus—if it had been permitted to be introduced to Congress, where it legitimately belonged—it would have passed by the votes of the Democracy, aided by those of the supporters of the Administration, and the support it would have obtained at the hands of the more liberal Whigs. But Mr. Clay ordained that the people should suffer; his slaves in Congress consummated the act; and let the infamy of the deed rest on the shoulders of the unprincipled of the Whigs, and him who, as Mr. Randolph of Roanoke fitly and eloquently said, attempted to sustain himself" and his hopes by forming a coalition between the puritan and the blackleg.

"Let the American people read and see, to their utter amazement, that a caucus of unprincipled demagogues at Washington, acting at the nod of Mr. Clay, can and do blight and desecrate the dearest and holiest interests of the nation. Let them read and know these things; and then, if they be true to themselves, let them advance in solid columns to the rescue of an administration that is entitled to every man's confidence, respect, and approbation."

Mr. F. desired, also, that an article in the Madisonian of this morning, on the same subject, might be read.

Mr. WISE wished to know whether this was a privileged question, and whether it had preference over the business of the House.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] asked leave to make a personal explanation; and permission was granted him by the general consent of the House.

Mr. WISE said he only wished to know whether this was a privileged question. He certainly should not object to extending to the gentleman the usual courtesy of the House.

The article from the Madisonian was then read as follows:

NEW YORK, January 19, 1843.

One of the most disgraceful acts that ever distinguished a faction, occurred at Washington a few days prior to the uttering of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, in reference to the exchequer bill.

It is a somewhat roundabout way, to be sure, to get facts before the public, that transpire at Washington, to send this from New York to the American metropolis; but, as there are obstacles here in the way of free communication, and as the fact I wish to get to the world is important, I send it to you—and here I state it.

The night before the Committee of Ways and Means was to report on the exchequer bill, a "caucus" of the Whigs was held, and the subject was taken up for consideration.

After consultation and debate had been had, it was found that there was a strong and a determined disposition, on the part of the Whigs, to report favorably, and to vote in favor of the bill. Indeed, there was a majority of the caucus in favor of such an issue. In the midst of this state of feeling, it was urged by unprincipled leaders that, if the bill found a favorable report, and should, by any chance, be adopted, it would at once insure the popularity of the Administration, and facilitate the prosperity of the President. This, of itself, in all probability, would have been enough to damn the bill, and secure the defeat of the exchequer scheme; but other aids were called in to consummate the unprincipled baseness of the Whigs.

To complete the work of iniquity, a letter—written, as it is said, by Mr. Clay—dated at Natchez, was read, in which it was urged that Congress ought to linger on till the 4th of March, do nothing for the country, and thus, by "applying the screws to the whole commerce and business of the nation, rouse it to indignation toward the President, and thus aid the towering ambition of the Kentucky candidate for the Presidency."

My sources of information are correct and authentic; and the facts here stated cannot be denied by the Whigs in Congress.

But for the acts of the Whig caucus, the Committee of Ways and Means would have reported the exchequer bill, on the basis of the scheme presented by the Executive; it would have been taken up in the House, and been adopted by the votes of the Democrats, aided by the liberal Whigs.

These facts are of too much consequence to the people of the United States to be kept back; and they should be heralded to the world, that the citizens of the United States may know how it is that they are imposed upon, and saddled with embarrassments of the most distressing and blasting nature.

The House would perceive that very grave and serious charges were brought against the Committee of Ways and Means on their reporting against the exchequer. The first charge in the article in the New York Union, and reiterated in the Madisonian, was this:

"It had been ascertained that the majority of the more liberal and discreet Whigs were in favor of the exchequer scheme recommended by the Executive; and it was further ascertained that it was very probable that the Committee of Ways and Means would report in favor of the bill brought forward by Mr. Cushing. This fact having reached the ears of the leaders of the Clay faction, a caucus was ordered and holden, and went into operation the night before the report of the committee was made."

In regard to the single fact there stated, he desired to say that the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject was made on Monday morning; so that, if the caucus was held on the night preceding that report, it must have been held on Sunday evening. No caucus, however, was held, on that or any other subject, to his knowledge; and no communication came to his knowledge, from any source, showing that a Whig caucus had been held directing that report to be made.

The next charge was:

"At the opening of the caucus, it was plain that a majority of the Whigs present, weary of waging a reckless, unprofitable, and infamous opposition to the people's will, had determined to go forth like men, and sustain the President and the exchequer. At this stage of the affair, the leaders took their stand, and commenced a furious attack on the President and the Administration, and denounced them both; and having got up much excitement, they avowed that, if any man, as a Whig, gave the least countenance to the plan of the President, he would be a traitor to his party; and, as such, be presented to his country."

He had only to say, in reference to that charge, that he had no knowledge of it, and had no belief that anything like it ever took place; and he challenged any one to rise in his place, and say that he could prove it to be true.

The next charge was, "that a letter from Mr. Clay had been produced and read at the caucus," &c. [Here Mr. F. read the paragraph on that subject above quoted.] To this he could only say that he knew not what Mr. Clay's sentiments were on the subject; that he never heard that Mr. Clay wrote any letter on the subject; and that no such letter of Mr. Clay was ever presented at any Whig caucus at which he was present; nor spoken of, nor alluded to. The only knowledge he had of Mr. Clay's sentiments on the subject, was that general knowledge derived from observing his political course of conduct.

Having denied, as he did peremptorily and emphatically, any knowledge of the subject, he had only to say further, that all the statements contained in the two articles to which he had called the attention of the House were, so far as he had any knowledge of the subject, unequivocally false. If any members here knew any facts or circumstances sustaining them, he begged that they would bring them out. It was due to the subject, and due to the country, that they should speak out, if they had anything to say on the subject. In justice to the Committee of Ways and Means, he would say that they took up the subject of the exchequer with a sincere desire to recommend it, or some similar measure, to the House; and it was after the most mature and serious consideration that they came to the conclusion that they could only perform their duty to the country by recommending its rejection. He did not know that his duty to himself, or to the committee, required that he should say more. If there were any members present who had any knowledge of the subject, he would say that it was their duty to communicate it to the world. Mr. F. was also understood to ask if any of "the guard" knew anything of the matter, that they would rise and disclose it.

Mr. WISE inquired if the gentleman from New York, by his last allusion—which he (Mr. W.) thought was at least gratuitous—meant to impute to him, or any of the other members of "the guard," as the gentleman was pleased to call them, any part or lot in the publication in the Union.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had not meant to impute to any one of those gentlemen either part or lot in so dishonorable a transaction.

Mr. WISE said he knew no more about that publication than the gentleman from New York did: he saw it for the first time this morning in the Madisonian; and he was astonished, or he might have been astonished, at the facts there detailed, whatever little foundation there might be at the present time for such statements; yet, looking at the past, he did know—and the gentlemen themselves had confessed before the country by the adoption of a report, which they adopted by a majority, he believed, of 100 to 80, at the last session of Congress, in which they set forth the fact in reference to a fiscal agent—that a caucus, and nothing but a caucus, by its machinery, did contrive the legislation of Congress; that a caucus sent its agent to the President, to know what his will was, in order that they might contrive their legislation; or, in the language of their own report, or of the gentleman from Massachusetts at the last session, that they might conform their action in compliance with the executive will. He had now only to say, on this matter, that he congratulated the gentlemen if they thought—and, whether this was false or true, he knew not—that if it was true, it would be disgraceful: he congratulated himself that they had awakened to true sentiments; and that if a caucus should dictate to the House what its legislation should be, it would be disreputable to that standing committee (of Ways and Means)—that it would be disreputable to its chairman, [Mr. FILLMORE,] and disreputable to the party which thus conducted the legislation of the country. Whether the gentleman and his party had been in past, or in the present instance, so guilty, let the world judge from the report which they had adopted; in which it was stated by themselves that they did, in an informal manner, send the emissary of a caucus on the subject of a fiscal agent, to ascertain how they might comply with the Executive will.

He did not wish to consume the time of the House; nor should he have risen, but for the allusion to himself, and five other gentlemen on that floor; and he would conclude now, by moving that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the exchequer bill reported by the select committee at the last session of Congress; and in Committee of the Whole they would have an opportunity to discuss the whole subject; and after the committee had reported to the House, they would be able to determine who was for action, and who was against action on that subject. He, for one, did not, on his part, wish to take up the time of the House, or to waste it by this negative action. He hoped the gentlemen would go to business like men, take up the exchequer bill, and, by their own action, show the truth or falsehood of these statements in relation to their conduct.

Mr. FILLMORE rose to inquire if there was not a special order for to-day?

The SPEAKER was understood to reply in the negative.

Mr. FILLMORE said there must certainly be a mistake.

The SPEAKER directed the Clerk to consult the journal.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, in the mean time, asked permission to present to the House a memorial from Philadelphia in favor of the exchequer scheme recommended by the select committee; and he moved its reference to the Committee of the Whole having that bill in charge.

He also asked leave to present the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia in favor of the prosecution of the coast survey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk, having consulted the journal, reported that the special order was for Monday next, the 30th instant.

Mr. BRIGGS understood that Monday the 30th was set apart for Territorial business.

Mr. FILLMORE said there was certainly a mistake, and it had occurred thus: The Committee of Ways and Means brought in their report on Monday, two weeks ago, on the subject of the exchequer scheme of the President; and, amongst other things, proposed its postponement until Monday two weeks, (this day,) and that it be made the special order for that day. It would now be recollected that the question went over until the next day, (Tuesday,) and thus the error had occurred; Monday two weeks, being Monday the 30th instant.

Mr. CUSHING, to get rid of the difficulty, moved to postpone the special order, (if there were one for to-day,) that the House might go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURNELL and Mr. GIDDINGS were understood to present petitions on the subject of the currency, deeming this a favorable opportunity to do so.

Mr. BOTTS rose and said he wished to make a remark on a subject brought to the attention of the House a few days ago, as on a privileged question. He alluded to the vote taken in relation to the printing of 5,000 extra copies of the reports from the Committee on Commerce, on the subject of the imprisonment of colored seamen in Southern ports. That vote was passed without much attention, or he certainly should have opposed it at the time. It was enough to say that neither report was read to the House; and he did not wish to commit himself on such a subject, or to give it his sanction, until he had fully examined it; nor did he wish that it should receive congressional sanction by an order for the printing of an additional number. If it would have the tendency to allay excitement, he would not object; but as he did not conceive such would be the result, he now moved a reconsideration of the vote by which 5,000 extra copies of those reports were ordered.

Some irregular conversation ensued; in the midst of which, it was understood that some gentleman moved to lay the question of reconsideration on the table.

Mr. WISE inquired what the question in these reports was, before he voted on this motion. He wished simply to inquire if it was not a discussion whether a sovereign State had the power to prevent free negroes from returning to the Commonwealth. Under an act of the Legislature of Virginia, she prohibited free negroes returning; and under that law, some colored seamen, who had entered her ports, had been arrested; and he wished to know if these reports, and the bill accompanying one of them, were to prevent Virginia from saying who should enter within her limits?

Mr. KING rose to make some remarks; but

The SPEAKER said a motion had been made to lay the reconsideration on the table; and that was not a debatable question.

Mr. WISE asked if the motion to lay on the table should prevail, if it would not, in effect, sanction the printing of the 5,000 extra copies?

Some conversation ensued.

The yeas and nays were then called for, and ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 85, nays 112, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was not carried.

Mr. WISE then rose and moved the previous question.

Mr. KING appealed to him to withdraw the motion.

Mr. WISE declined doing so. He thought gentlemen had made up their minds on the subject.

Mr. STANLY inquired what would be the effect of sustaining the previous question.

The SPEAKER replied that it would bring the House to a direct vote on the motion to reconsider.

The call for the previous question was sustained—ayes 94, noes not counted.

Mr. SLADE called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be now put; and they were ordered.

The main question was then ordered to be now put—yeas 128, nays 68, as follows:

So the vote, by which the printing of the reports was ordered, was reconsidered.

The question of printing the reports then coming up for consideration,

Mr. FILLMORE observed that, as the vote just taken might be considered as a test of the sense of the House, he would move to lay the motion to print on the table.

Several members expressing the desire that the subject might be passed over for the present without any formal motion,

Mr. FILLMORE withdrew his motion to lay the pending question on the table.

Mr. WISE renewed the motion, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, on the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 84, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. So the motion to print the reports was laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, a communication from the Navy Department, on the subject of certain expenditures, was referred to the Committee on the Expenditures of the Navy Department, with instructions to inquire into their legality and propriety.

Mr. FILLMORE wished to know, now, what was the order of the day.

The SPEAKER was understood to say the special order.

Some conversation in relation thereto, and some explanations were gone into, amidst much confusion. Ultimately, the House was brought to the question on the motion to lay the reports on the table.

Mr. FILLMORE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted in yeas 74, nays 114, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Arrington, Baker, Barton, Beeson, Bowne, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Burnell, Green W. Thompson, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trotti, Turney, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—114.

So the motion to lay on the table was negatived.

Mr. EVERETT then withdrew his motion to amend, which was made on a previous day.

Mr. BIDLACK then obtained the floor, and commenced by referring to the statement that Parson Miller had made a mistake of one thousand years in his calculations as to the day of the final destruction of the world. He (Mr. B.) had found himself in a similar predicament. Being anxious to obtain the floor, for the purpose of speaking on the bill to repeal the bankrupt law, and having calculated on a certain day when he should speak, he found that he was now not only mistaken as to the time, but also as to the subject on which he would have to deliver his speech. In consequence, much of what he had desired to say was now lost. He had desired to speak from the notes he had prepared on the evening that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] spoke; but they were now out of his possession; and even if he had them, he doubted whether they would be applicable to the question now before the House. [Many voices, "What is the question?"] He was asked by gentlemen all around him what was the question. As he understood it, the question before the House was the resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as related to the collection, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public money, declaring that the scheme of an exchequer proposed by the Executive should not be adopted; together with the counter-resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON] which he was in favor of adopting.

He believed that the people of this country desired Congress to postpone their discussions about the executive officers of the Government, and do something for the good of the country. Much had been said about the "universal Whig party"—how it got into power, how it died, and what physicians attended it. This reminded him of the nursery tale, part of which read: "Who killed Cock Robin? Who saw him die?" [Laughter.] "I," says the gentleman from Accomac, [Mr. WISE;] "I saw him die." [General laughter.] No man knew more of the seeds of disease—how they were sown, and by whom—than the gentleman from Accomac. That gentleman was correct in assigning the causes of its downfall. So far from the Whigs being right in charging their defeats upon the present Chief Magistrate, he (Mr. B.) believed the gentleman was entirely correct in saying that the Whig party would have fallen per se, even if John Tyler had never had anything to do with it. [Laughter.] The manner in which it was collected together insured its destruction.

Here Mr. BARNARD rose, and called the gentleman [Mr. BIDLACK] to order.

The SPEAKER desired the gentleman from New York to state his point of order.

Mr. BARNARD made a statement not heard above the general noise.

Mr. PICKENS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDLACK] is only stating the question. He is, therefore, clearly entitled to proceed.

Mr. BIDLACK. I am sure I am right. If the gentleman calls me to order, I will show him how it is that it is. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNARD. My point of order is, that the gentleman is not discussing, or approaching to discuss, the question before the House.

The SPEAKER said he would remark to the House that the bill to repeal the bankrupt law had certainly given rise to a debate of a very general and irrelevant character, and not strictly in order. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] should insist on his point of order—that is, on a strict observance of the rules of the House—the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDLACK] must take his seat.

Mr. BARNARD said he did insist upon it.

Mr. BIDLACK said he would bow to the decision of the Chair. He did not much regret that he was prevented from proceeding in the strain in which he had commenced, especially as his remarks were applicable to a party now so dead; and the House will recollect the old adage—that we should say as little about the dead as possible, except what was good: "De mortuis, nil nisi bonum." [Laughter.] He would remark, nevertheless, by way of apology—[Many members: "No need of any apology."] Really, the House was difficult to please. [Laughter.] He knew not whether he could make a speech of an hour without saying anything on the subject. If the House had allowed him to say what he wished in the first place, he should have been done in ten minutes. He was then going on to show that, in relation to the currency, the people would not be satisfied with the adoption of a mere resolution. [Several: "You are out of order now."] He was told he was out of order, because he said something that related to the subject! At home he was reputed a good-natured man; not so here. It seemed that a man could get nothing in that House, except what he had to fight for. Perhaps it would be found he could do better at that than at speaking.

It appeared to him that a majority of this House never would be able to settle their accounts with the people, if they contented themselves with merely adopting the resolution, and then leaving the subject to slumber. Whether what had been asserted in an article in the "Union," read this morning by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,]—that a Whig caucus had prevented the Committee of Ways and Means from reporting the exchequer bill—was true or not, he had no means of knowing. Yet he feared a determination had been come to, to do nothing; and there leave the question. He believed that it was in accordance with the wishes of a distinguished individual—a candidate for the Presidency—to leave the question open until after the Presidential election, as was alleged to have been his wish in regard to the tariff. [Many voices, "Who is he?"] That man must be dull of comprehension who did not know to whom he alluded.

He was willing to let gentlemen enjoy all the obtuseness of intellect that they claimed, and, therefore, he would not mention the name of the individual. What he wished to say was, that, though he was opposed to the resolution as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, he was not in favor of the exchequer plan as recommended by the Executive. He was opposed to endorsing paper money any further than was rendered necessary by existing demands on the treasury, which might be supplied by the issue of treasury notes. The plans of the President, of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] were all recommended by plausible reasoning. That of the gentleman from Massachusetts was, he thought, the most acceptable. But either was, in his opinion, an entering wedge to a paper-money system which he could never approve. But he did not desire to discuss the exchequer. What he had sought an opportunity to do was to show that it was the duty of the majority to adopt some plan, and that they could not escape that responsibility by endeavoring to throw it upon the President's veto of the bank bill; for Mr. Clay himself had expressed his willingness to dispense with the agency of the Bank of the United States, if any other expedient could be devised. It was this which had induced him to demur to the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] who had endeavored to throw all the blame upon John Tyler's "constitutional fact." He referred to what took place when the gentleman from Kentucky was addressing the House, and when that gentleman said:

"The very fact that the present Executive attended the Harrisburg convention, that it was declared in every paper throughout the United States that Mr. Clay was his favorite for the Presidency, had convinced the people that he would approve and sign anything that Mr. Clay favored.

"Mr. BIDLACK (Mr. U. yielding the floor) inquired if Mr. Clay himself had not, on various occasions, and particularly in his speech at Hanover, disclaimed that he was in favor of a national bank? [Several voices "No."] If he had not said that it was a question which was to be postponed and submitted to the decision of the people?

"Mr. UNDERWOOD said he had never heard any disclaimer imputed to Mr. Clay before, since the canvass of 1840 commenced; if there was anything in any speech he (Mr. Clay) had ever made, disclaiming the policy of a national bank, he was was ignorant of it. He requested the gentleman to produce it."

He (Mr. B.) pledged himself to produce it. He had done so heretofore in his speech on the bank bill at the extra session, in which he produced evidence that Mr. Clay was willing that other expedients should be tried before a national bank was again resorted to. Subsequently, he had endeavored to get the floor to redeem his pledge; and, as he had been prevented by the course taken, he now claimed the right, on this occasion, to do what he had been called upon to do.

All that he professed to be was an humble member of the Democratic party. He was not sufficiently connected with the President to enable him to defend him; but his doctrine was, "let justice be done, though the heavens fall." He did think that the gentleman from Kentucky argued unfairly in contending that John Tyler was guilty of treachery in vetoing a bank, because he (Mr. Tyler) was once in favor of Mr. Clay as President. The argument of the gentleman was this: Mr. Clay is in favor of a bank; John Tyler was in favor of Mr. Clay; therefore, John Tyler was bound to sign a bank bill! He took occasion to say that this was not a correct conclusion, and that Mr. Clay, in his speech at Taylorsville, had said that other expedients might be resorted to. Mr. Clay expressed himself willing to leave the matter to the arbitrament of enlightened public opinion. Therefore, he contended that it would not have been inconsistent in Mr. Clay, had he been elected President, to have resorted to all other expedients before he took a bank of the United States.

In order not to do injustice to Mr. Clay, he would ask the attention of the House to the exact language of that distinguished individual, in his published remarks. It is:

"That the currency of the country, its stability and uniform value, and, as intimately and indissolubly connected with it, the insurance of the faithful performance of the fiscal services necessary to the Government, should be maintained and secured by exercising all the powers requisite to those objects, with which Congress is constitutionally invested. These are the great ends to be aimed at—the means are of subordinate importance. Whether these ends, indispensable to the well-being both of the people and the Government, are to be attained by sound and safe State banks carefully selected and properly distributed, or by a new bank of the United States, with such limitations, conditions, and restrictions as have been indicated by experience, should be left to the arbitrament of enlightened public opinion."

He would take occasion to say that Mr. Clay's course, in his Hanover speech, was not in accordance with his general boldness and openness of character. In that speech he but pursued a portion of the Whig policy in 1840, which was "all things to all men." Therefore, Mr. Clay told the people of Virginia, with whom he thought a bank to be unpopular, that he was willing to try other expedients. It was the same policy which induced the venerable Harrison to be represented at the North as an Anti-mason, and at the South as the peculiar friend of the slaveholders. It was the same policy which the Whigs pursued when they declared in favor of a tariff in the North, and against it in the South. If the Democratic candidate was any the better for any particular quality, or for holding any particular principles, the Whig was sure to have it just as it was with the man who wished to sell his horse, when one of the bystanders inquired if he was not spavined? "Spavined! spavined!" said he; "I don't know exactly what that is; but if the horse is any the better for being spavined, he is spavined!" [Laughter.]

Mr. B. referred to the course taken by the leading Whig paper of Virginia on this question in 1841, immediately preceding the inauguration of General Harrison, and when the election of a Senator from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] was pending before the Legislature. An article in the Richmond Whig of March 2, 1841, contains the following words:

"I propose to shew, that, unless the Whig party are prepared now to devote themselves to the accomplishment of objects not only not avowed then, but disavowed—that unless they are willing to incur the suspicion that the ends to be attained by the elevation of General Harrison were not honestly and fully stated to the people during the canvass—they are not only not required to elect a bank Senator, but that they are forbidden to do so by every consideration of justice, candor, and fair dealing."

This writer, after going on to show that he, and the other Whigs with whom he had acted, have constantly denied the issue now contended for, inquires:

"Did we not refer to General Harrison's oft-repeated declaration, that the Constitution contained no grant of power to create a bank; and that he could not be induced to sign a charter until there had been a fair trial, to determine whether the fiscal concerns of the Government could be managed without one; and, moreover, unequivocal evidence of the popular approbation of the measure? How, then, can any one contend that nothing but a national bank was looked to by the friends of the President as a substitute for the sub-treasury, as the consequence of the ejection of Mr. Van Buren?

"General Harrison having been elected with the open avowal of constitutional opposition to a bank, except in one contingency, and not apprizing the people that he considered that contingency as having occurred—the fair inference is, that the people of the United States are opposed to a bank."

The same writer further remarked:

"Recollecting the course pursued in Virginia by his friends, it seems to me that we are debarred from the agitation of the bank question. Is any friend of General Harrison willing to see a national bank established, at the hazard of charging him with committing a fraud on the people? How could he escape it, if the election of a bank Senator is claimed as an act of justice to him? Would it not be an acknowledgment of the charge preferred by his enemies, that he concealed his opinions on that subject? Is there one man in Virginia, who took an active part in the late contest, who appealed to the people to discard Mr. Van Buren, that a bank might be established? Indeed, I might go further, and inquire if the adoption of any one of the prominent measures which some indiscreet Whigs, intoxicated with success, are demanding a called session to enact, was urged as a reason for the dismissal of Martin Van Buren."

After referring to the letter of General Harrison to Sherrod Williams, and to some other circumstances, the article went on to say:

"Under these circumstances, so far from the Whigs being under any obligation to elect a bank Senator, does not the President elect stand pledged to the country to make trial of some other system, before he can adopt the national bank? General Harrison, at present, enjoys the reputation of being an honest man, in the fullest sense of the term; of being a frank, open-hearted soldier, as well as a prudent statesman; and I believe he deserves it. He should beware, then, how he receives counsel which would make him depart from the strict letter of the understanding with the American people on which he was elected."

After reading the above extracts, Mr. B. asked, how could the gentleman from Kentucky, or the Whig party, charge Mr. Tyler with treachery, for doing just what Mr. Clay said he would do.

Again: Mr. Clay, in his Hanover speech, after expressing his individual preference for a national bank, used the following language:

"But it is the end—that of a sound and sufficient currency, and a faithful execution of the fiscal duties of Government—that should engage the dispassionate and candid consideration of the whole community. There is nothing in the name of a bank of the United States which has any magical charm, or to which any one need be wedded. It is to secure certain great objects, without which society cannot prosper; and if, contrary to my apprehensions, these objects can be accomplished by dispensing with the agency of a bank of the United States, and employing that of State banks, all ought to rejoice, and heartily acquiesce; and none would more than I should."

Mr. Clay, in this paragraph, expressed his willingness that other expedients should be adopted; and, if it should be found that the objects he had in view—viz: a sound and sufficient currency, and a faithful execution of the fiscal duties of the Government—could be accomplished by dispensing with a bank of the United States, none would rejoice more than he would.

He did not wish to be understood, in these remarks, as enlisting against Mr. Clay, and in favor of Mr. Tyler; but, as a fair and a candid man, recollecting these remarks of Mr. Clay at Hanover, he thought it no more than fair and just to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to them, for the purpose of showing him that he had no more right to draw conclusions derogatory to Mr. Tyler, than he had to censure Mr. Clay for the same thing. He knew that it was in the power of the sophistry of the gentleman from Kentucky, as well as others of Mr. Clay's friends, to explain away these things, and make them mean anything or nothing; but he thought that it would generally be believed by the intelligent of the country, that Mr. Clay, when he made his Hanover speech, was willing to accommodate himself to the particular atmosphere by which he was surrounded. He did not intend, when he rose, to occupy the attention of the House thus long. The question on which he wished to speak was not before the House, and he was unprepared with the notes of many things he wished to refer to. He had, however, endeavored to redeem the pledge he made some days ago to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] and he trusted and believed that he had succeeded.

Mr. CUSHING said he did not know what it was the purpose of the House to do in reference to the subject before them—whether it was their intention summarily to defeat the exchequer bill, by adopting the resolution before them, or to suffer it to undergo a regular discussion and examination on its merits. He could hardly believe that it could be the pleasure of the House to dismiss so important a measure in this summary manner—to condemn it first, and try it afterwards. He could not believe that the House would decide against it without any discussion. It was said of Rhadamanthus that he punished first, and tried afterwards—"castigat auditque;" but that was a mode of procedure fit only for the regions below, and not for the judgments of that House.

He would, in the first place, move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "not," as that would be the most appropriate way to bring the whole subject up for discussion; and then, after laying before the House a number of memorials on the subject, which he had not yet had an opportunity of presenting, he would move an adjournment, reserving his remarks for to-morrow. Mr. C. then laid before the House a number of memorials from the principal cities of the United States, all praying for the passage of the exchequer bill; after which, he moved that the House adjourn; which motion prevailing,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 24, 1843.

Mr. CONRAD presented a petition from Laurens Millander, of Louisiana, praying for confirmation of sales of public lands in the New Orleans land district; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with an amendment, the bill to apply certain alternate sections of the public domain towards the completion of works of internal improvements in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes, accompanied by a special report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred sundry memorials from all parts of the United States, and resolutions adopted by the Legislatures of the States, in favor of restricting the franking privilege, and of reducing the rates of postage, reported a bill to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege; and a bill to reduce the rates of postage; which were read, and ordered to a second reading.

[The bill concerning postages fixes the rate on all single letters carried a distance not exceeding thirty miles, at five cents; for all distances exceeding thirty miles, ten cents. Double, triple, and quadruple letters, in the same proportion. On newspapers, not exceeding in dimension 1,350 square inches, one cent postage; on papers exceeding that dimension, one cent additional for every 5 square inches above the 1,350 square inches.]

Mr. WALKER remarked that the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the memorial of John Grant, of Mississippi, praying certain compensation, had instructed him to report the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the contract made with John Grant, for dredging the channel of the Choctaw pass, in the harbor of Mobile, in October, 1836; together with the date of the cancellation of the said contract, and the reasons therefor; also, a copy of any contract made with others for said work since 1836, and when the work was commenced under such contract; together with a statement of all the moneys expended in improving said Choctaw pass since 1836; also, a copy of the contract for excavations in the Dog river bar, and when said excavations commenced under said contract, and the price paid for any machines to execute that work; also, a statement of the time consumed in the construction of the steam dredging machine built for the removal of the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi, including the time of transportation and other delays, until the work of excavating commenced.

The resolution was then read and adopted.

On motion of Mr. CONRAD, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury touching the question of refunding certain purchase money to citizens of Louisiana, was taken from the table, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House entitled "An act to transfer to the trustees of Centre College, in Kentucky, the lands heretofore granted to the Kentucky Asylum for the teaching the Deaf and Dumb."

Mr. B., from the same committee, reported a bill to settle the title to Pea Patch island, in the river Delaware; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The following bills were then read the third time, and passed:

The bill for the benefit of the Planters' Bank of Mississippi, and the Agricultural Bank of Mississippi; and

The bill to amend the charter of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia.

The bill for the relief of Richard H. Wilde (by granting him the benefit of the copyright laws of the United States to a certain work of his on Italian literature, notwithstanding such work may be first published in England) was taken up and read the third time; and the question then being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. TAPPAN made some remarks adverse to its passage, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BERRIEN made some remarks in favor of the bill; when

The question being taken on its passage, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 15.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a petition from Balie Peyton, now of New Orleans, praying the payment of the award of certain arbitrators, for property taken by the United States on which to erect a light-house; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. RIVES, the House bill for the relief of Teackle Savage, administrator of Bolitha Laws, which had been reported adversely upon by the Committee on Claims, was taken up and recommitted to that committee—some additional testimony in favor of the claim involved having been received.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Mary W. Thompson; which was read, and ordered to a second reading; and the report accompanying ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented several memorials from the cities of New York, Buffalo, and Troy, in the State of New York, in favor of the plan for the board of exchequer recommended by the Executive; which were ordered to lie on the table.

OREGON TERRITORY.

The bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon came up on its passage, as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. WOODBURY, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate at considerable length in support of the bill.

He considered the Oregon Territory as incontestably ours, as any other of our possessions. There was no more reason against our occupying it, than there could have been against our exercising jurisdiction over Iowa or Wisconsin when we placed them under our territorial government. There could be only one of two objections to our exercising the same ownership—one of which was, that we entertain some doubt of our title; and the other, that it may be inexpedient to exercise our undoubted right.

To neither of these reasons could he accede. Indeed, so far as regards the first, he was glad to find that there was not a single member of the Senate who seemed to entertain the slightest doubt of our just title to the entire of the territory. All contend that our right to all we claim is indefeasible. Why, then, should there be any hesitation about exercising our ownership over the territory? The dispute between us and England never can be about that; for she does not profess to deny our right to territory. She may reasonably confine us to the letter of the existing treaty; but, in doing this, she is necessarily bound to show that she conforms strictly to it herself. If she gives it a construction which we hitherto have not given to it, she can have no just cause of complaint should we adopt her construction. But, in truth, that treaty can neither give nor withhold rights of territory, and the exercise of sovereignty; for it is expressly limited to a specific purpose—that of securing, during its continuance, the free and open intercourse of the citizens of one of the contracting parties, and subjects of the other, for purposes of trade and commerce, leaving the rights of the respective parties untouched. As, then, England gains no right over our portion of the territory but that of freedom to trade, like that of our own citizens—for which she concedes an equivalent right to our citizens over her portion of territory, if she has any—what other country can dispute our exercise of jurisdiction? Not France, for she sold to us all possible claim she could have derived; not Spain, for her title is transferred to us; and certainly not Russia, for we do not propose to encroach upon her southern boundary beyond the 54th degree of northern latitude. No other country under heaven can have any pretension to our territory; and we have seen that the existing treaty with England, so far from giving her any, expressly stipulates that its obligations shall not be construed in any manner to affect title. If she was not conscious that she could set up no claim of her own, she would not endeavor to make the world believe that her object is, in contending for the narrow slip of land really in dispute north of the Columbia river, merely to keep open, for the benefit of all nations, a free port at the mouth of that river. And even this she did not think of till we made a settlement there. This is not the first time she has interfered to prevent enterprises for the advancement of our commerce. Mr. W. here mentioned several instances of like interference.

The question is, what are our rights? We derive them either by purchase, discovery, or by treaty. If she has any, she must show as good a title, or yield that ours is superior; and this sets at rest her claims. She did not purchase the undoubted title of Spain to all her rights on the Northwest coast, as we did; she did not discover the Columbia river, as we did; and with regard to treaties, it has been shown, over and over again, that she acquired no right to soil or territory under any one to which she has been a party. There is nothing of the kind in her treaty with Russia, in her treaty with Spain, or in her treaty with ourselves. In no one of these treaties has she gained an iota of claim to soil or territory. She is granted nothing but a joint use of the right to fish, hunt, trade, or navigate.

There is not a word in the treaty of 1818 about joint occupation or settlement. We do not look to that treaty for our right to occupy or to settle our Territory of Oregon. We stand upon our incontestable title. Neither can she derive from it what it does not directly or indirectly mention. It is merely a treaty of trade and commerce, to be free and open to the subjects and citizens of the two powers. We might sign a treaty to-morrow, giving England an equal right with our own citizens to free trade with the port of New York; but who could be so absurd as to contend that we thereby conveyed to her a joint occupancy and joint right of settlement on the soil and territory of New York to the defeasement of our own title?

By the treaty of 1818, renewed in 1827, the citizens and subjects of both powers are undoubtedly entitled to a free and open exercise of intercourse for purposes of trade and commerce. On our part, we refrain from exacting duties on goods belonging to British subjects found on our territory; and England guaranties the same with respect to our citizens on territory claimed by her. This is the true, and only true, meaning and spirit of the treaty.

Mr. W. here entered upon a critical examination of the treaty of 1818, and its renewal in 1827, showing that no other construction could be put upon the wording of both, than that which he had given. In confirmation of this, he cited various passages in the communications from the British ministers in every convention or negotiation held with them from the time of the treaty of 1818, to the time that the renewal of the charter of the Hudson Bay Company gave a new impetus to its encroachments, and induced it to seek a pledge from the British Government for the protection of any interests which might grow up in its settlement. At the time of negotiating the renewal of the treaty of 1818, in 1826, the very propositions for additional stipulations which the British minister made, show that England never did construe the treaty as reaching to anything but trade and commerce; and the refusal of our negotiators to admit those additional stipulations showed that we peremptorily refused to grant the right of joint occupation and settlement.

Mr. W. here quoted in full the various propositions alluded to, and conclusively established his position from concurrent testimony.

It was clear, then, that, in carrying out the provisions of this bill, we would in nowise interfere or act in conflict with our obligations by treaty, so long as we take care not to interrupt the right of British subjects to the free and open pursuits of objects of trade and commerce. The question, then, was narrowed down into a very small compass. There can be no doubt of our right to the territory: on that, all were agreed. The treaty cannot restrain us from the exercise of that right, for it has no bearing whatever upon it; and, therefore, the remaining thing to be settled is the question of expediency. That, too, he conceived, now admitted of no doubt.

That it is expedient to go as far at present as this bill proposes to go, he was perfectly satisfied—satisfied that, in doing so, we would not only give no just grounds of complaint to Great Bri ain, but that it would be the means of preventing future and more formidable, because more accumulated, causes of difficulty with that Government. But, independent of this consideration, there was another, which he thought imperative; and it was, that our citizens, who have cast their fortunes in the territory, claim our protection, and it is our duty to grant it. It is the duty of the United States to protect our citizens in their lawful pursuits on every portion of our territory, no matter how remote or inconvenient from the nucleus of Government. It is the duty of Congress to extend its territorial laws for the benefit of those remotely-settled citizens.

It is especially expedient that all this should be done now, and quickly; seeing that the longer neglect of fulfilling this duty is laid hold of by a rival power as a ground for enlarging and strengthening pretensions which never could have arisen, had we made a timely effort to secure our rights from cavil. Besides the duty which binds us to protect our citizens in this territory, we owe it to our commercial interest, in distant seas, to provide for them a harbor of shelter, such as the Columbia alone affords, on the Northwest coast. Our fleet stationed in the Pacific, for the protection of our commerce, is entitled to the facilities which we should create there for re-equipment, refitting, and revictualing. We should have a fort there, which would serve them as a naval station, with our citizens around it ready at all times to make a market with their productions for the wants of our marine service in that distant quarter. England could not be jealous of this, for she has done the same thing. And, independent of all these considerations, there is another class of beings to whom we owe obligations which it is our duty to fulfil. He alluded to the aborigines of the territory. It is our duty to extend to them protection, and there is abundant evidence that they stand in need of it. It is our duty to introduce among them the arts of civilization, and the lights of the gospel. In no other way can we so well, so effectually, and so cheaply fulfil all these duties, as by carrying out the provisions of this bill.

Mr. PHELPS remarked that, as a member of the committee which reported the bill, he concurred in the general views taken by the committee; and in respect to the general conditions involved in the bill, he believed the committee were unanimously in favor of them. With the views of Senators he had nothing to say; but he felt it his duty, as a member of the committee, to vindicate the bill from the charge that its provisions came in conflict with the convention made between this Government and Great Britain for the joint occupation of the Territory of Oregon. He would only say that, if such was the effect of the bill, it departed very widely from the purposes of the committee in agreeing to it. There was nothing further from their purpose than to involve this country in a difficulty with the most powerful nation on the globe, by a violation of the rights of that nation under the convention alluded to. He was confident that the bill, as it stood under the new modification, did not conflict with that convention, but was in conformity with the construction Great Britain herself put upon its provisions.

As the bill came from the committee, it provided that one section of 640 acres of land should be given to each white male inhabitant who might settle in that territory; but, under the new modification, it provided that provision shall be made by law for the granting of 640 acres to each settler. The provision, as it stood, made the grant of land; but the modification says that provision shall be made by law to grant it. The modification, he conceived, made no difference; for the principle at the back of it was the same. The great question, and only question, was, whether the bill came in conflict with the convention or agreement between the two countries. He believed that it was perfectly harmonious with the convention, if they put upon that convention the construction which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY] showed had been placed upon it by England herself—as that of a commercial treaty only. If it did even extend so far as to prohibit the settlement of the country at all, the bill did not conflict with the convention, because it proceeded on the principle of a prospective settlement—of holding out inducements merely to our citizens to settle there. Great Britain could have nothing to do with it, even under the latter construction, until the act was carried into effect—that is, by hereafter making the grant which was guarantied in the bill. The bill only holds out the inducement for our citizens to go and make settlements, but not to take exclusive and permanent possession of the country. The bill could not be made a subject of complaint by Great Britain, until the grant of land was actually made, and the country taken possession of, or the citizens occupying lands under title from the United States came in conflict with British subjects. There was a stronger ground still. The question raised was, as to the purport of the convention of 1818—how far did it permit citizens of this country to occupy that territory. The provisions of the convention were, simply, that any portion of the country claimed by either of the parties to the convention should, from the signing of that convention, be free and open to the subjects and citizens of both Governments; and that its provisions should not be construed to prejudice any claim of this country, or right to the territory. The joint occupation was not, in terms, for purposes of trade, or for purposes of settlement. The convention was general; and whether it allowed of permanent settlements in the country, or not, was a question of construction. If England complains of the action of Congress, it must be on the ground that we misunderstand the construction of that convention. If we follow the construction given to it by her, there can be no question as to the propriety of the passage of this bill. Mr. P. then cited from the law of Parliament resting on the convention, in favor of the Hudson Bay Company, a provision to the effect that nothing in that act should be construed to allow any body corporate to make grants, or to exercise the rights of trade with the Indians, to the exclusion of citizens of the United States of America. He then quoted further provisions of the law, which went conclusively to prove that the treaty was one of trade and commerce with the Indians merely, and that the rights of the United States were scrupulously guarded. He then quoted other provisions of the act of Parliament extending the laws of Canada over the portions of that territory at the disposal of the Hudson Bay Company, as a justification of the provision of this bill which authorized the courts of the United States to extend their jurisdiction over the American settlements in that territory.

Mr. P. then went on to say that the promise of a provision hereafter, by Congress, of a grant of lands to settlers, is of the same nature as our pre-emption rights allowed in the States and Territories of the United States. It is not necessary that the grant of lands should precede the occupancy. Our system has been to permit the occupancy first, giving a pre-emption right, which is to secure the possession afterwards. The provision of this bill would act in like manner. It would be viewed in the light of a pre-emption right to such portion of territory as should belong to us.

It is not necessary for England to make such a law for the encouragement of her settlers. No one but the Crown can dispute title with them. The mere possession and continued occupancy is sufficient title to insure the grant from the Crown at some future time, and is relied upon as safely as if secured by act of Parliament. The subjects of Great Britain already have this possession and occupancy; and to place our citizens on an equal footing, it is indispensable that we give them the assurance which this bill proposes—which is the mode in which we always secure settlers in our new territories.

No man in the Senate was more opposed to war than he was. He knew that peace was essential to the interests of this country. He knew that it suited best with the habits and pursuits of our people. He would not, therefore, lightly advocate anything calculated to produce collision with a foreign power. But, although he would not wantonly enter into conflict, he could not, to shun it, give countenance to an act so absurd as that of a mere idle assertion of our rights without an accompanying and absolutely necessary provision for exercising them.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had examined the bill with a sincere desire to give it his support; but he felt constrained to say, after a careful examination of the treaty of 1818, that he feared it could not, consistently with good faith, become the law of the land. He would go as far as he who went farthest in maintaining the rights of this country, and asserting our claim to the Oregon Territory, and in passing all necessary laws within the limits of the just powers of this Government; but, while he was for sustaining those rights, he was also for preserving all the covenants entered into by this Government with a foreign power. The only questions to which he desired to direct their attention were, first, as to whether this bill did or did not interfere with the stipulations of the convention of 1818. When this question was satisfactorily settled, the only remaining question would be, Was it expedient to pass the bill? In order to ascertain whether the bill would conflict with the stipulations of that convention, it would be necessary to examine not only the phraseology, but the spirit and object of the convention. By the terms of the convention, it was agreed that the country, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, should be free and open, for the space of ten years, to the vessels, subjects, and citizens of the two powers. Whether the terms "free and open" were—as the Senator from New Hampshire supposed—to be confined to the sense of a mere trading establishment, leaving both parties free to assert their right to exercise jurisdiction over the territory; whether it were a mere commercial treaty, or (as was supposed by other gentlemen) it were capable of a more extended construction, giving the rights of national occupancy to the subjects of each nation;—in either point of view, the same result would follow—viz: that neither Government had the right to interfere with the rights of the citizens of the other. He was now speaking of the principle involved in the words of the convention; and that was clearly that, if this Government exercise the right of granting titles to any portion of the disputed territory, it amounted to an exercise of sovereignty and jurisdiction, which might conflict with the freedom and openness provided for by the treaty. It was the highest assertion of right that could possibly be made, and would most undoubtedly operate to the disadvantage of the other contracting party. What was the principal object of the treaty? It was to prevent the occurrence of quarrels and dissensions between the parties. With the knowledge of this fact, could any Senator doubt that the design was, that no grants of land should be made by either party? Would it not serve to create those very disputes and difficulties which the convention was intended to avert?

There was not much analogy between this case and the case stated by the Senator from New Hampshire—of a treaty of commerce between this country and Russia, by which the port of Archangel should be free for American vessels. This bill provided expressly that any portion of the territory might be occupied by settlers emigrating from this country, and that a good title should be given to them; which was the highest act of sovereignty.

It had been stated that this bill proposed to do nothing more than Great Britain had already done; but if he had rightly understood the purport of the communication which was read to the Senate yesterday, they were informed by the Secretary of State that the British Government had expressly disavowed the making of any grants. He was not going to deny that Great Britain—who grasped at every advantage—would be very willing that this territory should be settled by her own subjects; but if they were to believe the assertion of her accredited agent in this case, she had done nothing which could interfere with the stipulations of the convention; and yet it was proposed by this bill to exercise the highest act of sovereignty that could be exercised by any Government. Was he not right, then, in saying that the bill would conflict with the convention? Gentlemen would ask, did they mean to suffer themselves to be entirely dispossessed by the Hudson Bay Company? No such thing. He would go so far as to say it would be wise to put an end to their encroachments; but he would do it in a way which the convention would allow, by giving one year's notice of our intention. He thought it far better to take this course, than to render themselves obnoxious to the imputation of having acted in contravention of our solemn engagements.

Mr. McDUFFIE next obtained the floor, and remarked that he had been reluctant to enter into this discussion; and certainly should not have risen to take part in it, had it not appeared to him that there were other grounds than those yet advanced, which would influence him in opposing the passage of this bill. The objections he had to it seemed to him to be of greater magnitude than could at that late hour be discussed. He would therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate in moving an adjournment.

At Mr. KING's suggestion, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till to-morrow morning.

The motion to adjourn having been withdrawn,

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate went into executive session; and after some time spent therein, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 24, 1843.

Mr. CROSS presented, under the resolution adopted by the House, the petitions following, to wit: Of Joseph H. Egner, praying a confirmation of title to a tract of land in Independence county, Arkansas, located by said Egner and Charles McArthur, in virtue of a Spanish claim.

And of L. D. Marchand, of Little Rock, Arkansas, for indemnity on account of spoliations committed by France prior to 1800; which were referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. GRAHAM asked leave to offer a resolution of inquiry, which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, as soon as practicable, answers to the following inquiries:

Are the commissioners appointed in pursuance of an appropriation made at the last session of Congress to adjudicate claims arising under the Cherokee treaty of 1835, instructed to hold their sessions in Washington, or among the Indians in North Carolina?

What other and further instructions are given to said commissioners?

The resolution was adopted.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

Mr. ROOSEVELT offered the following resolution, which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House, at as early a day as practicable, whether there has, or has not, been a great falling off in the accruing revenues from imports since the passage of the tariff act of the 30th August last, as compared with the same period in the years 1839, 1840, and 1841; and what, in his opinion, (assuming the said receipts since the 1st of September last as a basis,) will be the probable amount of the net revenue from imports for the year 1843; and the probable amount of the public debt at the end of the said year; and what measures, if any, will, in his opinion, be necessary to insure the punctual payment of the interest, and the ultimate liquidation of the principal, of the said debt.

This resolution could not, under the rules, be considered, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FILLMORE said a statement had already been submitted from the department.

Mr. ROOSEVELT said the report from the department did not cover the whole ground, but only related to a single quarter.

Mr. FILLMORE saw no necessity in accumulating these calls upon the departments.

Mr. BIRDSEYE objected to the further consideration of the resolution as out of order.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. STEENROD presented the memorial of the board of trade of Wheeling, in favor of an appropriation by Congress to remove the obstructions in the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. He moved that the memorial be printed.

Mr. STANLY objected to the printing of the memorial.

After some remarks from Mr. STEENROD, the question was taken, and the motion to print carried in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. WISE, the Committee on Naval Affairs were discharged from the consideration of sundry petitions.

GENERAL JACKSON IN RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. CRANSTON presented the resolutions of the State Legislature of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their best exertions to procure a remission of the fine imposed on General Jackson in 1815 by Judge Hall.

The preamble and resolutions were read; after which,

On motion of Mr. CRANSTON, they were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The several committees were called on for reports.

Mr. S. MASON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made an unfavorable report.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, made several adverse reports.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY, when the Committee on Commerce was called, rose and asked the House to take up, at an early day, the joint resolution of last session, reported by him, for continuing the treaties now in force with certain powers. He suggested that the 5th of February be set apart for that purpose.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected to the motion, and it was not considered.

Mr. BREWSTER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made an adverse report.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the bill reported last session from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reducing the rate of postages in the United States, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WM. RUSSELL, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an adverse report.

Mr. RUSSELL begged leave to offer a resolution, changing the hour of meeting to 11 o'clock on and after the 29th January.

Mr. BARNARD objected to the consideration of the resolution.

A motion was made by Mr. RUSSELL to suspend the rules for that purpose; which he, however, subsequently withdrew.

POTOMAC BRIDGE.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the progress and present condition of the works carried on for the repairs of the Potomac bridge, and which, by the act of September, 1841, were to be executed "under the orders and general direction" of said Secretary. And, also, what impediments have intervened to delay the final completion of the work; and why, with adequate appropriations at command, a sufficient force might not have been applied to secure to the public, for the present winter, so important an accommodation.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of certain settlers in the southeast district of Louisiana. The bill was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to ascertain and report to the House of Representatives the amount standing due and claimed on the books of the department to officers, seamen, marines, and others attached to the navy, from the time of its establishment to the year 1840.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Maria Fowler: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. FORNANCE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of the children of Mary Rhinewall: twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

On motion of Mr. MATHIOT, the same committee was discharged from the consideration of sundry memorials.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS AND CHINA.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred a message of the President recommending an appropriation for carrying on commercial intercourse with the Sandwich islands and China, made a report, accompanied by two bills—a bill to provide for future intercourse between the United States and the Government of the Hawaian or Sandwich islands; and a bill to provide means for future intercourse between the United States and China.

The bills were twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a desire to have them taken up and acted on at an early day, in order that they might go to the Senate.

The SPEAKER said he had no doubt the House would indulge the gentleman by going into Committee of the Whole at an early day, without making any special order on the subject.

Mr. GENTRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill from the Senate for the relief of Mary Tucker; which was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. HALSTED, from the Committee of Elections, reported bill No. 649—"A bill to suspend the operation of the second section of the act entitled 'An act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the Sixth Census' "—with an amendment: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAM RUSSELL made another attempt to get up his resolution changing the hour of the meeting of the House to 11 o'clock; but without success.

GEN. JACKSON'S FINE.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution directing the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill for refunding the fine imposed on Gen. Jackson, at New Orleans, in 1815, by Judge Hall—being the regular business of the morning hour.

Mr. BOTTS observed that he had had the floor since Friday last, without an opportunity to express his sentiments on the subject; and no member had evinced the least desire to call it up. He had waited so long, that the train of reflections in which he had indulged had been almost lost.

He thought that every one must have been struck with the peculiarity of the time, manner, and circumstances, in which this matter had been brought before the House. It was seven-and-twenty years ago that this fine was imposed on General Jackson, by a judicial officer, for what he termed a gross and outrageous contempt of the courts of justice; and yet it was but lately that the refunding of it was thought of. The proceeding, too, did not come from the people, but came from the Legislatures of several States, by instructions to their Senators, and requests to their Representatives, to vote immediately for the passage of a bill restoring the fine, with costs and interest—though the Government never pays interest to its creditors, though they may have had their lawful dues lying in the treasury for years. Let it be borne in mind, too, that this was the first Whig Congress that had sat for years; and, further, that it was the last Congress that would sit prior to the convention that was to nominate the candidate for the Presidency. The conclusion, therefore, was inevitable, that the whole proceeding was to purchase the political support of General Jackson for one or the other of the aspirants.

In the course of his political life, he had several times felt himself called on to speak in terms derogatory of General Jackson, and he had hoped that he should not be compelled to speak of him again; he had hoped that the General's friends would not have committed the imprudence of dragging this weak, if not superannuated, old man again into the political arena. In his whole life, he had found but one bright spot, and that was the one his friends were now endeavoring to wipe out—he meant his prompt submission to judicial authority.

As his own State (Virginia) had undertaken to interfere in this matter, and had given instructions to her Senators, and requested her Representatives, to vote for refunding this fine, he felt himself called upon to give the reasons why he could not comply with the request of the Legislature. Having received that request, he felt it to be his duty to look into all the facts connected with the case; and having done so, he came to the conclusion that he could not with propriety vote for the measure.

Mr. B. then went into a review of the transactions of General Jackson at New Orleans, from the time he took command there, till after the treaty of peace was made known to him; taking a brief view of the arrest of Louallier and Judge Hall, and the proceedings consequent thereon; and in the course of this part of his remarks, characterized the conduct of General Jackson as the most despotic, cruel, and tyrannical that had ever been perpetrated in any country. When Mr. B. spoke of General Jackson's application to the Legislature to suspend the habeas corpus act, and his declaration of martial law—

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL inquired of the gentleman if he had ever heard that the Legislature of Louisiana had shut up the courts of justice?

Mr. BOTTS said that he had not; and though it might be true that the Legislature did shut up the courts of the State, they had no power to shut up the United States courts.

After commenting on the facts he had stated, Mr. B. denied that General Jackson had the power to declare martial law, and to substitute his own absolute will for the laws of the country. He denied that he (the General) had the right to constitute himself the supreme judge, both in his own camp, and over the civil tribunals of the land; and to imprison judges, counsellors, clerks—and, in short, every officer connected with the administration of justice, declaring his own despotic will the supreme law of the land. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL,] a few days ago, not only denied the right of Judge Hall to pass sentence on General Jackson, but claimed for him the right of a trial by jury; and, to his (Mr. B's.) astonishment—for he had great respect for the gentleman's legal attainments—challenged the lawyers of the House to that issue. He (Mr. B.) never read but one law book in his life, and that was twenty years ago; and he would commend that authority (Blackstone's Commentaries) to the gentleman's notice, as he would find in it an ample refutation of the opinions he had given.

[Here Mr. B. made a long quotation from Blackstone's Commentaries on the subject of public wrongs.]

After reading those long extracts from Blackstone, he challenged the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL,] or any other lawyer on that floor, or in this country, to point to an instance in which contempt had been punished by a jury—in which a judge, sitting in his court, or even when not in his court, when his process had been obstructed, tried such contempt by a jury.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL, in the course of some observations which passed between him and Mr. BOTTS, inquired how the common law got into Louisiana.

Mr. BOTTS replied, precisely as it got into the District of Columbia, and everywhere else in this country. When Louisiana was admitted into the Union, the common law was necessarily introduced.

He then continued to observe, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL] had referred to the act of 1831 on the subject of contempts, to show that there was no authority for the course adopted on the part of Judge Hall. Now, the act of 1831 was designed to restrain the power of the courts on these questions of contempt. He read an extract from that enactment in confirmation of that position, and said that that act, although it was intended to curtail, to limit, and to restrain the courts in the exercise of their high prerogatives in cases of contempt, nevertheless was authority in such cases as this. And that was not only the law of the land, but it was right that it should be the law of the land; for to deprive judges of the power to punish for contempt, was at once to break down the power of the courts to administer justice and the laws of the land.

Now, having shown what were the facts of the case—having shown, as he had done, conclusively, that the Judge had the power to inflict this, the mildest punishment in such a case, he would proceed to show to the House that there was no propriety in the efforts now made to refund that money. For the information of the House, he would state a fact—which was, perhaps, not known to the members of the House generally, and still less to the people of this country, and certainly not known to the State Legislatures, which had instructed their Senators, and requested their Representatives, to aid in procuring the refunding of that fine. That fine had been remitted. That fine had been paid to General Jackson. Every dollar of that money General Jackson had received; and the authority on which he made that statement was an article in the Democratic Review, written by a warm personal and political friend of General Jackson, who had collected all his information from the public records, and from private history—he alluded to Mr. Amos Kendall. The article was a long one on the subject of General Jackson's fine, from which he would read an extract. He then read a passage, the purport of which was understood to be, that a subscription was made at New Orleans to refund the fine levied on General Jackson; that it was presented to, and accepted by, General Jackson; and by him was distributed amongst the widows and orphans of that place.

The SPEAKER here announced that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. BARNARD, Mr. CUSHING, and others begged the House to allow the gentleman from Virginia to go on, and occupy his whole hour, instead of postponing the residue of his speech until to-morrow: this was agreed to.

Mr. BOTTS resumed. Now, he called the attention of the House particularly to the fact, that the money was raised; that it was offered to General Jackson; and, in the language of this writer, [Mr. Kendall,] the money was accepted, and was distributed among the widows and orphans of New Orleans. Who could distribute the money, after it had been accepted by General Jackson, but General Jackson himself? Was it his own money? Could he distribute the money of other people among the widows and orphans of New Orleans? And it was an act of beneficence and of benevolence for which General Jackson got credit at the time. But now they were asked (and the gentlemen who made the request were aided by the protestations of General Jackson, and by the entreaties of General Jackson) to refund—what? The money he paid into the public treasury? No. To pay back the money he distributed in charity to the widows and orphans of New Orleans? Where was the authority for the distribution of that money, unless i was his own? And if it was his own, and he derived all the credit due to the benevolence of the act, where was the propriety of asking that House to refund that money? The result of the whole inquiry had led him to the conclusion that the attempt made, and the manner in which it had been made, to procure the passage of a bill to refund that fine, had grown out of what he had adverted to in the first portion of his remarks—that it was an attempt to purchase the political favor of Gen. Jackson, notwithstanding Gen. Jackson had himself told them he would take the money on no other terms than a recognition of his right to do all he did; and unless they would declare, either expressly or by implication, that he had the power to declare martial law; that he had the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus; that he had the power to imprison the judge; and that he was guiltless of the lawless acts arrayed against him. They were called upon to do all this, and thereby to disgrace Judge Hall; and to do it at a period just before the nomination, by national conventions, of candidates for the Presidency from amongst the gentlemen who had been put prominently forward. They had witnessed the enthusiasm of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] who, some short time since, was in such hot haste to pass this bill; but, since the publication of General Jackson's letter in the public prints, that gentleman had sat as placid and as quiet as a lamb, without even attempting to call it up during the morning hour, or the expression of any anxiety on the subject. And if that letter had been published at an earlier period, he doubted whether the Legislatures of Virginia and South Carolina would ever have instructed their Senators and requested their Representatives to aid the passage of this bill to refund that fine.

After a few remarks on this bidding for the favor of General Jackson, and the expression of his conviction that there was one who was likely to be a candidate for the Presidency, who stood on too lofty a pinnacle ever to stoop so low, he asked why, as it was not done when General Jackson was in the pride and insolence of his power, it should be done now?

Mr. RAYNER obtained the floor; but

Mr. FILLMORE called for the orders of the day.

PETERSBURG RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. CARY craved permission to report a bill from the Senate, for the relief of the Petersburg Railroad Company.

The bill was taken up, and was read twice. A motion was then made that it be put upon its third reading; to which, however, objection was made.

Mr. PICKENS hoped the motion would be agreed to, and that no objection would be made to its passage, for it would not affect the revenue.

Mr. FILLMORE said it was an important measure, and should not be passed without some consideration.

Mr. CARY said he would observe that, if the bill was not passed soon, it would be of no avail.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BOTTS asked permission to explain the object of the bill, and he thought objection to it would be removed. According to the tariff law of 1842, a duty was imposed on railroad iron. But all such iron imported and laid down before the 3d of March, 1843, was exempt from duty; and this bill was merely designed to extend the time for laying down the rails, the iron being already in the country. If, however, this bill were not passed, and the company were compelled to lay down its rails within the time now specified, they would do it; but they would necessarily be driven to arrest the travel and the transportation of the mails on the great line of Southern and Northern transportation.

Mr. CUSHING begged leave to state a corresponding fact. He was directed to state, that if the Eastern railroad had not also an extension of time for the like purpose, they would be compelled to lay down their rails while the ground was still frozen and covered with snow.

Mr. BOTTS said, if these companies were driven to lay down their rails under such circumstances, the lives and limbs of many persons would be endangered, while travelling over the road.

Mr. PICKENS said this bill would not deprive the treasury of a single dollar, as the iron was already in the country. But, if the bill were committed, he would move to amend it, by the substitution of the more general bill, extending the same privilege to companies in other States of the Union, that their rails might all be permanently laid down.

Mr. FILLMORE said this bill presented the serious question whether they would or would not repeal a portion of the tariff act of 1842.

He was the more opposed to the object of the bill, because it was for the benefit of a particular company. He hoped, if any action was to be had, it would be by the passage of a general bill.

Mr. PICKENS suggested that the bill be taken up, and amended accordingly.

Mr. FILLMORE said he was not prepared to amend it. He then went on to say that this was an innovation in favor of an incorporated company at the South. If any companies required exemption, it was those at the North, which had not the advantage of a track in winter free from snow. Moreover, he thought that the laws on the subject of exempting railroad iron would require some revision. This bill extended the exemption to all iron laid down; whilst the act of 1832 was modified so as to apply only to bars of iron. He hoped that the bill would be postponed for a day.

Mr. PICKENS intimated his willingness to accept the modification proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] if that gentleman would consent to have the bill now acted on.

Mr. CARY hoped there would be no delay.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he was in favor of referring the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means. He was opposed to it in every shape. He was opposed to the privileges it was designed to grant, whether made general or special. Already had this Petersburg company laid down their rails.

Mr. CARY said, merely temporarily; not with a design to be permanent.

Mr. RANDOLPH was entirely opposed to such an early commencement of the work of repealing the provisions of the tariff of last session. He was opposed to any and every act which might have that tendency. Already had this grant remitted between three and four millions of duties on railroad iron. Yet this country abounded in iron ore! It had the materials, the machinery, the workmen; and, with all these advantages, not a foot of railroad had been laid with American iron. Congress had continually favored railroad companies. Why, he asked, should they be favored above other portions of society? Why take millions from the treasury for their benefit?

Mr. PICKENS wished to know what the gentleman meant by saying that this bill would deprive the treasury of its revenue. The iron was already in the country.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he could easily answer the question. The iron had come into the country subject to duty, unless the company complied with certain conditions. The company did not wish to comply with those conditions, but wished other conditions extended to them—without which, they would have to pay duty. He would mention the fact that various capitalists had, upon the faith of the tariff bill of the last session, invested their money in the manufacture of railroad iron. Would it not be doing a great injustice to remit the duties on railroad iron, after the enactments of the late session?

Mr. SALTONSTALL made a few remarks in advocacy of the principles of the bill.

Mr. CARY desired to say that a great injury would be perpetrated upon a large portion of his constituents, if this bill should not be speedily passed; and no good could come to any human being. If he thought that the treasury would suffer by the passage of the bill, he would not urge it. But it interfered with no vested rights. It would not affect the iron interest. The iron was already imported. If it would not be considered out of order to refer to the proceedings of the Senate, he would say that it had been there contended that this bill presented a special case, and was sui generis. Its passage only involved a question of time. If not passed immediately, its friends would not give a farthing for it.

He believed that, before the passage of the tariff bill of last session, there was no manufactory of railroad iron in the United States. Since that bill was passed, one manufactory had been established. When he saw men in the other wing of the Capitol, who advocated different views on the subject of the tariff, sustaining this bill, he could but think that it was right, and ought to be passed.

After some remarks from Messrs. FILLMORE and BOTTS, the floor was obtained by Mr. BRIGGS. The subject was then laid over until to-morrow.

RETRENCHMENT AT NEW YORK.

Mr. G. DAVIS asked leave to introduce a bill "to reduce the number and compensation of the officers and other persons employed at the port of New York."

Mr. CUSHING inquired if the bill was to be introduced as a matter of favor.

Mr. G. DAVIS said that he designed to move its reference.

Mr. CUSHING made no objection.

The bill was then read. It recites the number of officers employed in the custom-house at New York, together with their aggregate salaries in 1828 and in 1840, and provides for a reduction of the same.

Mr. G. DAVIS moved that the bill be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUSHING moved that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WISE objected to the printing of the bill. He should hereafter object to the introduction of everything which he did not know something about.

Mr. HOLMES objected to the bill altogether. Under the guise of a bill, it was in reality a series of charges preferred against the administrations of the Federal Government for the last twelve or fourteen years. With the alarming fact that during the fourth quarter of 1842, instead of eight millions of revenue, there was but eight and a half millions of importations; it was proposed not to increase the revenue, but merely to reduce the salaries of the collecting officers!

He was unwilling to hold out to the people an inducement to believe that their burdens were to be reduced by such a bill as the present. But the time would come when their distresses would be relieved—when, by an alteration of the tariff, new blood would be infused into the body politic.

After some further remarks from Mr. H., not distinctly heard,

Mr. CUSHING inquired whether it would be in order to call for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER said it would not—the bill now before the House having been introduced by general consent.

Mr. WISE said he had objected to it.

The SPEAKER had not heard any objection from the gentleman.

Mr. CUSHING then moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. G. DAVIS called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered.

Mr. BARNARD appealed to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] to withdraw his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. CUSHING declined doing so, unless the author of the bill now before the House would move to refer it to one of the standing committees, instead of the Committee of the Whole.

The question was then taken on laying the bill on the table, and resulted—yeas 15, nays 155.

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

The question then recurred on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative, without a division.

THE EXCHEQUER BILL.

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means, adverse to the plan of the exchequer, as recommended by the President, came up for consideration as the regular order of the day. The state of the question was this: The report of the majority of the committee concluded with a resolution that it was not expedient to adopt the plan of an exchequer as proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and recommended to Congress by the Executive; which resolution Mr. CUSHING had yesterday moved to amend by striking out the word "not."

Mr. CUSHING, who had the floor, observed that these propositions embraced the whole subject of the currency and the finances of the country; and in the uncertainty whether the House ever intended to go into Committee of the Whole on the exchequer bill, he should in this form enter into the question as introductory to the debate upon the whole subject. Mr. Burke, in his writings on the French Revolution, complained that the age of chivalry was gone, and that the age of sophistry and chicanery had succeeded it. There was much truth in this remark. The present age was agitated with questions of banking, finance, and currency—all of them questions in which the interests rather than the feelings of mankind were involved. In discussing, then, the question before the House, he must ask its indulgence while he gave a dry and uninteresting statement of facts—facts which he could only take time to state, without stopping to discuss them.

The resolution of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, (upon his motion to amend which the question was pending,) was a mere negation of action of any sort whatever; but although it was impliedly merely negative of a particular measure, yet it, in effect, avowed an exclusive preference for a United States bank. In the whole scope of the financial questions before them, the committee had gone into only one form of a single idea, which they negatived. That the House and the country might see the particular nature of this report, let it be supposed that, in the tariff act prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury in obedience to the order of the House—let it be supposed that the Committee of Ways and Means, instead of reporting that bill back, or of amending it, or reporting some other bill on the same subject, when the demand of the country was so urgent for settling the tariff question—had simply reported that it was not expedient to pass the particular bill presented by the Secretary of the Treasury. Had such a report been made at the last session, everybody would have said that the Committee of Ways and Means had not performed their duty—not met the wants and expectations of the country. Now, in their report upon the exchequer, the Committee of Ways and Means had done precisely the same thing that he had imagined in respect to the tariff. In the preliminary debate on this subject, the select committee to whom it was referred at the last session was taken to task for reporting a bill of their own, instead of reporting back to the House the bill of the Secretary of the Treasury; and their conduct was commented on in very severe terms. But what was the contrast presented between the course of the select committee, and that of the Committee of Ways and Means? The former, whilst they presented a bill different from that of the Secretary of the Treasury, were not then, and were not now, exclusively devoted to it. If the majority of the House were ready to adopt the bill of the Secretary of the Treasury, he was ready to vote for it; and if the House should go into Committee of the Whole on the bill of the select committee, it was his purpose to move to substitute for it the bill of the Secretary of the Treasury. He would do this, that the whole subject might be brought before the House; and that no gentleman might avoid the responsibility, that rested on him, of voting on it.

We come (said Mr. C.) to the investigation of this question in a peculiar exigency in the affairs of the Government. With the expiration of the charter of the United States Bank, had expired all the laws regulating the depositing, disbursing, and transfer of the public moneys by means of that institution. The independent treasury had been repealed by law; and that mode of regulating the public deposites, disbursements, and transfers, had also ceased to exist. What, then, was the peculiar predicament of the Government, when the Committee of Ways and Means had refused to do anything in relation to the subject? Why, the public deposites were held by the Treasurer of the United States, under the act of 1789; [here Mr. C. recited the act;] and it was upon the extremely general provisions of that act that the deposites and disbursements of the public money were now made, subject only to the discretion of the Executive. And in regard to the materials to be received at the treasury, there was but one act regulating that subject; and that was the resolution of 1816. [Here Mr. C. recited the provisions of that act.]

In this predicament of the Government, the President of the United States, in whom this discretion was imposed by the existing laws, came to the House, and asked it to relieve him of that discretion, and to take away from him this general power over the treasury. To this appeal of the Executive—that Congress should strip him of this power, and impose fixed bounds and limits to his authority—what was the reply of the Committee of Ways and Means? It was, that he should retain that power—that he should not be relieved of his responsibility, unless it could be done by the agency of a joint stock bank. That was precisely the state of the question. It was not meeting the exigencies of the Government to say that, because they cannot have a United States bank, the Committee of Ways and Means will not agree that there shall be any legislation on the subject. But there was a question beyond the mere exigency of the Government; and that was, the exigency of the people. Now, what did the people of the United States want in regard to this matter? Did they respond to this reply of the Committee of Ways and Means? Did they say that, because there could not be a bank of the United States, there should be no legislation on the subject? He said, no. No portion of the people of the United States took the ground that there should be no legislation on the subject, unless for the purpose of chartering a bank of the United States. Here Mr. C. referred to the late elections, to show what were the sentiments of the people on the subject. He admitted that there was a minority of the people of the country who wanted a bank of the United States; but he denied that any portion of that minority took the ground that they would have one, or nothing else. In the first place, they did not desire a bank of the United States, in order that they might obtain a greater facility of loans for there was already too much bank capital in the country. He repeated that they did not desire a bank of the United States for the purpose of adding to the sum total of bank paper currency, and thereby increasing the facility of obtaining loans. If, then, the minority of the people did not desire a bank of the United States for this purpose, for what purpose did they desire it? They desired it, in the first place, as a depository; secondly, for the transfer of funds from one point to another; thirdly, to give a nationality to paper currency, instead of gold and silver; and, fourthly, to strengthen the credit of the paper of the State banks. Now he contended that all these objects were attainable without the aid of a United States bank. But, if it were otherwise, could a bank of the United States be had? He assumed that it could not in the current three years; that it could not be had during the remaining two years of the present Administration, nor in the first year of the next. Would the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] have the country wait for that long period, without any legislation on the subject of the finances? But he would present a stronger case. He would assume that there could be no bank of the United States for the next seven years. There was, therefore, a stronger case presented; and he would ask the Committee of Ways and Means if they would have the country wait for the next seven years, without any legislation on the subject of the currency, and the safekeeping and disbursement of the public money, because they cannot get a bank of the United States?

But, again: suppose a bank charter a possible fact, within a period of three years—which it was not—then there was another point of view in which it must be seen: could the stock be subscribed? He assumed that it could not be subscribed abroad, where there was an absolute horror of the credit of the United States. And he assumed that it could not be subscribed at home, for there was a growing distrust of bank investments; and it was a period of time when they could not obtain a loan on the credit of the United States at 6 per cent. interest. If, then, they could not obtain that loan, it was preposterous to suppose that they could get capitalists to join in a great stock bank; so that, if it was constitutionally a fact, it was not financially a possible fact.

But there might be another alternative, it was said; and that was, the sub-treasury. But he would say that the people of the United States did not want the sub-treasury, and their objection to it had been manifested by the elections. Though the affirmative of what should be the alternative for the sub-treasury was not put in issue, the sub-treasury itself was put in issue; and so far as the elections decided anything, they decided against the sub-treasury.

But, independent of this, the people did not want the sub-treasury, because it gave not a depository for depositors; it was not instrumental as a means of transfer; it did not regulate exchanges; nor did it furnish a currency for the country; which things the wants of the people called upon Congress to grant. Now, what was to remain? It was, to ask for some instrument or institution which shall, in the first place, be without certain things, against which the people of the United States had decided; and which should furnish certain things, amongst which were the means of deposite, the means of transfer, the means for a currency, and the means of regulation. Now, it behooved the committee to inquire if it was, or was not, advisable to provide an instrument or an institution which could be constitutionally and judiciously established, and meet the affirmative wants of the people of the United States, and avoid those things which they had negatived.

Now, the plan of the exchequer (whether the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury, or of the committee) did all that the people required. It gave them everything in a United States bank which the people want; and avoided everything in it which the people did not want, and everything which was against the fixed financial feelings of the people of the United States. The exchequer gave what the people wanted, and all that they wanted. He had presented a vast number of memorials in its favor, and he knew there was a vast mass on the way to the Capitol, praying for its adoption, without distinction of party. He was informed that one had been signed by 3,000 of the best and wisest men of Boston. He had assumed, then, that the exchequer would meet the exigencies of the Government and the wants of the people; and he now proceeded to notice the plan of its issues. True, there were differences between the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury and the plan of the committee; but the differences were immaterial and did not affect the general idea; and if any portion of the House desired to change the amount of the issues, and other immaterial portions of the bill, let them do it in committee. But he must be permitted to say that in a portion of the public press there had been a persevering delusion on the subject of the exchequer scheme. The Evening Post of New York had misrepresented the House bill; but he would reply to the objections to the exchequer scheme submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means. The committee objected, in the first place, that it was not so safe a depository as a United States bank. There was a time when he should have been ready to concur in opinion with the Committee of Ways and Means, that a United States bank, inasmuch as it gave the capital of the bank as a collateral security, was the safer depository; but when the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] affirmed, as a proposition of this day, that a United States bank was the safer depository, he (Mr. CUSHING) denied the truth of the position. With the prostrate condition and the ruin of the United States Bank (which was overthrown by mismanagement, and its capital squandered) before them, it did not become them to say the safer depository was a United States bank. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] admitted this tacitly in his report, when he said that the United States Government foresaw the danger in season to withdraw the deposites. In the second place, the committee objected that the exchequer was a Government bank; but in what respect was it so? Why, it was objected that the sub treasury was a bank. If the exchequer was a bank, because it received deposites, and bought bills of exchange, then the sub-treasury was a bank. But before they undertook to object to a thing on a mere word, it became them to analyze it thoroughly. He denied that the exchequer was in any sense a bank. The essence of a bank was a great stock corporation for profit.

But, then, the Committee of Ways and Means objected to the exchequer, that it was capable of expansion. But how? By a vote of the Congress of the United States. And what, then, was the proposition of the gentleman from New York? [Mr. FILLMORE.] Why, they could not trust the constitutional Government of the United States, including the President and the two branches of Congress; but they could trust a corporation of mercenary men. And was not that preposterous? But again: the gentleman said the promises of the exchequer were liable to non-redemption; that was, the Government of the United States would not take care of its own honor and credit, and would issue its paper without the means of redemption. Here, again, was the idea that they could trust a bank parlor directory in Philadelphia; but they could not trust the Government of the United States. All these, and other objections which he enumerated, which the committee had raised to the exchequer, he contended, told with tenfold force against a bank of the United States.

He pursued this subject at some length, and exposed what he conceived to be popular errors respecting a United States bank.

He did not wish gentlemen to understand that, in thus presenting these facts to the House, his idea was that paper should be excluded from the common transactions of men. Far from it. There was no more necessity for entirely excluding paper from the transactions of men, than for excluding it from the proceedings of the House. But he repeated, we never should have a stable currency, until we separated the faculty of making money from the faculty of lending it. [A member: "The exchequer proposes to loan money, and to make it also."] No, not to loan it.

He saw an illustration of the idea he had advanced, in what he had frequently observed during the progress of affairs in this country, and in the course of his reading about other countries. It was this: that in all free States there were two parties—the one in favor of onward movement toward the future; and the other in favor of recurrence to the past. The object of the latter party was to restore things which had existed. This was the radical error of the Committee of Ways and Means, in making their report. They forgot that the world was not now where it was ten years ago. New facts had occurred, new ideas had been developed, new purposes avowed. Forgetful of the new facts derived from past experience, the Committee of Ways and Means would call upon the Government to refuse all legislation, unless they could have restored an old fashioned bank of the United States.

At this point the hour expired, and

Mr. BARNARD obtained the floor.

Mr. T. F. MARSHALL was anxious that the gentleman should be allowed to proceed, and conclude his speech; but several members objected.

Mr. BARNARD claimed the floor, and moved an adjournment; which motion prevailed.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 25, 1843.

Mr. HUNTINGTON presented a memorial from the widow and ten children of Joshua Raymond, deceased, praying a pension for his services in the Revolutionary war, and indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800. The portion relating to the pension was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BATES presented a memorial from Joseph W. Cross, and other citizens of West Boyleston, Massachusetts, praying that provision may be made in all treaties between the United States and foreign powers for a peaceful adjustment of all international difficulties which may arise: referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a number of citizens of Cumberland county, Pa., in which they protest solemnly and humbly against the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of sundry citizens of Waterford, in the county of Washington, in Ohio, complaining of the deranged state of the currency, and the want of a national currency, and recommending the issue of $200,000,000 of Government stock, based on a pledge of the public domain, to be distributed in a representative ratio to the States and Territories, as a means of relief; which was referred to the Committe on Finance.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a joint resolution directing the transfer of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, to the State of Maryland, and the cities of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, on certain conditions; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Balie Peyton, and it was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from Elmyra, New York, in favor of the plan recommended by the Executive for a board of exchequer: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BAYARD, presented a petition from McKean Buchanan, a purser in the navy of the United States, praying indemnity for losses sustained by him in consequence of an order of his commanding officer forbidding the issue of articles denominated therein; and a petition praying to be allowed, in the settlement of his accounts, a commission on certain bills of exchange, drawn by him for the benefit of the public service; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill concerning the naval peace establishment; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the bill entitled "An act for the relief of John P. Skinner, and the legal representations of Isaac Green."

Messrs. BERRIEN and PHELPS explained that this bill was intended to relieve the individuals named, as sureties on a bond of Mr. Emerson, a pension agent, who failed, having some $10,000 of the money of the United States in his possession. The ground assumed in their argument, as a justification to relieve the sureties, was, that the sureties being cognizant of the insolvency of Emerson, gave notice to the Government of that fact, and pointed out a sufficiency of property held by him, against which process might be issued to secure the Government; but the United States officers, whose duty it was to protect its interests, neglected to take any legal proceedings to get possession of the property, and permitted private individuals to attach, and have all of it disposed of, to satisfy their claims; and then proceeded against the sureties, to secure the amount of the default of Emerson. These Senators maintained that the sureties, having pointed out property ample to secure the United States, should not be held responsible for the amount of the default, inasmuch as the proper officers of the Government neglected to proceed against the principal when he was possessed of the property.

Mr. EVANS made some remarks against the bill; but said, if it was to pass on the grounds assumed, to justify its passage it ought to appear on the face of the bill, so that it should not be hereafter drawn into a dangerous precedent. He, therefore, moved to amend the bill, to the effect that, in consequence of the failure of the proper officers of the Government to take legal proceedings against Emerson at the time requested by the sureties, said sureties should not be held to a fulfilment of the obligations of their bond.

Mr. KING opposed the bill, on the ground that it was establishing entirely a new principle—a very dangerous one, and one opposed to the practice of the Government in all past time, to relieve the sureties from the obligations of their bond, when the principal had failed. The custom had been always, and should remain so, of having process issued against the principal and sureties; so that, if one failed, the others might secure the interests of the United States.

The question was put on the amendment proposed by Mr. EVANS, and carried in the affirmative.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, the amendment concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The bill for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory then came up on its passage, as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose and addressed the Senate. A wise and prudent man, (said Mr. McD.,) in any of the various departments of human affairs, would be very reluctant to engage in any enterprise, however thoroughly satisfied of his right so do so, until he should have well considered, first, the appropriate time for its commencement; secondly, the means by which it was to be accomplished, and its probable cost; and, finally, the benefits which were ultimately to result from its accomplishment. And he must be permitted to say, if the worthy Senator from Missouri, who had, with so much zeal and ability, presented this bill to the consideration of the Senate, had violated any of the maxims of sound policy, (as he humbly conceived he had,) it had arisen from the circumstance of totally overlooking the considerations to which he had just alluded. All those Senators who had engaged in this discussion seemed to have limited their investigations to what he was compelled to regard as the most unimportant of all the questions which this measure involves. They had confined themselves to the mere abstract question of the right of title. They had argued the question as if the Senate of the United States was the tribunal which was to adjust and determine the question of the validity of the English or the American title; and as if this was the only question to be determined. He believed no Senator, who had taken part in this discussion, had expressed the slightest doubt as to the validity of the title of the United States to the Territory of Oregon. He had investigated the subject as fully and as thoroughly as the documentary evidence to which he had been able to obtain access had enabled him to do; and, with these lights before him, he was free to declare that he regarded the title of the United States, at least as far north as the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, as one of the clearest titles that was ever the subject of national controversy. But, at the same time that he made this declaration, he would be very sorry to assume the responsibility of precipitating the nation into any measure, upon his own judgment, or the judgment of the Senate, upon questions which it did not belong to either to determine. Gentlemen seemed to have forgotten that there were two parties interested in this question; and that, however clear our title might appear to us, theirs might appear equally clear to the other party. Here was a case of joint occupancy, and an existing question as to title. The Senate had seemed, throughout the whole discussion, to assume that ours was the true title, and were proceeding upon that assumption; although the British, at the same time, claimed that theirs was the true title. By whom were these conflicting claims to be settled? By one of the interested parties? Certainly not.

A few words on the subject of the convention of 1818, which had been indefinitely prolonged by that of 1827. He concurred perfectly with those Senators who had maintained that the provision of this act, which granted, or stipulated to grant, allodial titles, or titles in fee simple, to all those citizens of this country who might emigrate to that territory, was a palpable violation of the convention. It was in vain to disguise the fact, whatever might be determined in regard to this matter. They were about to take possession of the territory, to establish a line of American forts, and, by all the means and appliances of war, to defend that possession. They were about to invite the citizens of this country to go there—not for the purpose of carrying on the fur trade; not to do that which was consistent with a joint occupancy by the two parties to the convention; but to establish a permanent settlement. The British Government and the British nation, however we might disguise the fact in our arguments here, could not be so blind as not to perceive the palpable object of this measure. He begged to inquire of the worthy Senators who took so deep an interest in the fate of this bill, what was the existing emergency which called upon the United States to take this step? The question, for the last twenty-four years, had been allowed to slumber, while we were in the midst of the greatest national prosperity, with a treasury so abundantly supplied that the wit and ingenuity of man could not find out a legitimate mode of disencumbering it of its superabundant treasure. He called upon Senators to state what was the existing emergency, which demanded, now, that a measure of this kind should be adopted. Why was it that they were invoked at this moment—and, he must be permitted to say, this inauspicious moment—to enter into a measure of this kind? Why had it not been done twenty years ago, or at some subsequent period prior to the present? He was decidedly averse to embark in it now. What was the condition of our affairs in relation to England? Had they already forgotten that only the other day a momentous treaty had been concluded, with England, concerning one of the most embarrassing difficulties that had arisen since the termination of the late war? He would ask, How, and at whose instance, was that adjustment made? It was made at the instance of that nation, concerning whose grasping ambition so much had been said by gentlemen on this floor. Was it her ambition, her love of conquest, and desire of the acquisition of territory, that induced England to send to us the olive branch of peace, in the form of an extraordinary mission? Great Britain voluntarily moved in this matter, and tendered to us the olive branch of peace; and he thanked God that our Government accepted it in the spirit in which it was extended to us. He was not disposed to find fault with the result of those negotiations, even if they had conceded much more territory than was conceded, had it been done with the consent of the State immediately interested, and consistently with the honor of the country. He would rather that peace should be made on almost any terms, than to go to war. The matter had been adjusted; and he must be permitted to say, that for the adjustment of this question, if for nothing else, the people of the United States owed a debt of lasting gratitude to the Administration by whom this adjustment had been effected; and he would go further, and say, that every patriot in England, and every patriot in the United States, would shake hands, and declare that the Government of each was indebted to the negotiators. He thanked God that the treaty had been brought to a successful termination. Well, sir, (said Mr. McD.,) while congratulating ourselves on the termination of these great difficulties, at such a moment as this, what are we about to do? While a part of our territorial boundary remained still to be adjusted—while the question was still a subject of pending negotiation between the two countries—the Senate of the United States, a branch of the Legislature, intimately connected with the treaty-making power, is about to adopt a military movement, in order to take military possession of the territory. Now, however we may view this act, whatever interpretation we may place upon it—I will ask gentlemen to assume to themselves for a moment the position of the British ministry, and imagine what would be the natural effect upon their minds of a measure of this kind. Sir, they sent us the olive branch of peace to adjust the most important difficulty. Instead of reciprocating the amicable spirit manifested by them, we are about to send forth the flaming sword of defiance;—yes, at the very moment our minister is instructed to negotiate for a settlement of the question, we snatch from their hands the olive branch of peace, and place the sword of defiance in its stead. This may be strong language; but strong as it is, it is not stronger than the natural interpretation which will be placed on our conduct, if this bill be passed, by Great Britain.

I have asked, what is the emergency which demands the passage of this bill? Is there any probability that we shall fail in the adjustment of the question by negotiation? If gentlemen believe we shall fail, and that we shall ultimately be under the necessity of resorting to force of arms to establish our title and maintain our occupation, this is an additional reason why we should adopt no measure which, in the estimation of the civilized world, and in our own, could possibly place us in the wrong. Let us fairly and honorably try to negotiate. Let us try to adjust this boundary, as we have done the other. And, as I think the title of the United States is infinitely more clear than that upon which the negotiation has just terminated, I think the probability of an amicable adjustment is so much the greater. But gentlemen say we must proceed in this way—we must take possession, because the British are doing the same. They are making lodgments, establishing settlements, looking forward to the exclusive possession at some future period. Now, I totally dissent from this opinion; and if there is any one conclusion to which the documents before the Senate must irresistibly bring the minds of Senators, it is that Great Britain has not the remotest idea—that she has not done a solitary act, nor uttered a solitary word, on the question, evincing the remotest desire to make permanent exclusive settlements in that territory. All that she desired, all that they have ever claimed, is the right to prosecute the fur-trade, and to make such temporary settlements as were necessary to accomplish that object. Have they done more, sir? It is true the worthy Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MOREHEAD] made a formidable array of charges against England, in reference to acts which she has already done. In the first place, that she has made a fort one hundred miles from the mouth of the Columbia river; and the gentleman, with that candor which forbids him to suppress any part of the truth, read a full account of that fort, concluding with a statement that it was a mere stockade fort, in its very character intended for no other purpose than to repel the attacks of the Indians; and so it is with all the other forts which they have established. This, then, amounts to nothing; it furnishes no evidence of an intention of establishing permanent settlements, the idea of which seems to have taken hold of the minds of Senators. The Senator from Kentucky related another very important fact. He said, England has violated the convention, which stipulated the joint occupancy in the prosecution of the fur trade; because, whenever our boats ascended the Columbia river to trade with the Indians, they were immediately driven off by the English, who had the audacity to come there and sell goods to the poor Indians cheaper than the Americans did; and this was a violation of the convention. Why, sir, this harmonizes very badly with the remark of the worthy Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WOODBURY,] who indicated, as one important object to be gained by the passage of this bill, the civilization of the Indians. But, if we cannot afford to sell them goods at a cheap rate, it surely does not show a very Christian spirit. But all this is mere words. I put it to the Senate whether any one, in the course of this discussion, has put his finger on a solitary act which indicated an intention, on the part of Great Britain, to establish for herself an exclusive occupation. I assert that, as far as I have examined, I have discovered no evidence of any such intention.

Now, Mr. President, having pressed these brief views, tending to show the inexpediency of adopting such a measure at this time, in reference to negotiations now pending between the two countries, let me ask the Senate, What will be the natural interpretation that England will put upon our act? If we had passed the measure without debate, it might not have been regarded in any degree offensive; but you may rest assured, when this act comes to be regarded by the British Ministry, particularly if they have any desire to take possession of the territory, what will be the interpretation they will put upon it? They will interpret the act by the speeches delivered here. Will they not, sir? Consult your own bosoms. What is the impression produced upon yourselves, when an English paper—not even a ministerial paper—throws out denunciations against the United States?

What, then, will be their interpretation of this act, military in its character, heralded forth to the world with denunciations against England, on account of her grasping ambition—referring to her acts in the Eastern hemisphere, in Asia and in China, as well as on this continent? Sir, however calmly we may hear these things, the British will not hear them with calmness. Now, sir, let me tell you how many gentlemen are mistaken as to the feeling existing in England in regard to this subject. I was there for about six months during the years 1838 and 1839; and if I were called upon on my oath to declare what appeared to be the most prevailing sentiment in England, I would say it was an absolute horror of the idea of a war with America. All ranks, high and low, every person I encountered, in the highway and elsewhere, universally concurred in the sentiment that the ancient feuds that had separated the two countries had passed away—that a new era had grown up—that they were bound together by the strong ties of consanguinity, both being of the Anglo-Saxon race, differing from all the rest of the world; and I heard the language used—language in which I concurred—that if the two Governments, on a question of mere boundary, which might be intrusted to arbitrators, should involve themselves in war, they would deserve the eternal execration of the world. This was the universal sentiment.

Sir, I am not afraid of being charged with dreading the tremendous power of England. Surely, the courage of the people of the United States, illustrated in so many glorious battles by land and by sea, is not reduced to so low an ebb, that they may not venture to be just and moderate for fear of encountering the hazard of being thought to be cowardly. No, sir; no such interpretation will be put upon our conduct. I confidently believe, therefore, that if we wait with patience, and fairly employ the means of peace which are in our hands, and leave the executive department of the Government to discharge its duty, I confidently believe, from the progress already made in the adjustment of our difficulties, that this comparatively unimportant one would be adjusted. So far, sir, as regards our foreign relations.

But there are some domestic views of the subject which gentlemen have overlooked. What do we want with this territory? What are we to do with it? What is to be the consequence of our taking possession of it? What is the act we are called on now to do? Why, it is neither more nor less than an act of colonization, for the first time proposed since the foundation of this Government. If this were a question of gradual, and continuous, and progressive settlement—if the territory, to which our citizens are invited, were really to become a part of this Union, it would present a very different question. But, sir, does any man seriously suppose that any State which can be formed at the mouth of the Columbia river, or any of the inhabitable parts of that territory, would ever become one of the States of this Union? I have great faith—no one had much greater—in the power of the representative prineiple to extend the sphere of government; but I confess that, even in the most sanguine days of my youth, I never conceived the possibility of embracing within the same Government people living five thousand miles apart. But, sir, the worthy Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY] seems to have discovered a principle much more potent than the representative principle. He refers you to steam, as far more potent. I should doubt very much whether the elements, or powers, or organization of the principles of government, will ever be changed by steam. Steam! How are we to apply steam in this case? Has the Senator examined the character of the country? What is the character of the country? Why, as I understand it, that about seven hundred miles this side of the Rocky Mountains is uninhabitable, where rain scarcely ever falls—a barren sandy soil. On the other side—we have it from a very intelligent gentleman, sent to explore that country by the State Department, that there are three successive ridges of mountains extending towards the Pacific, and running nearly parallel; which mountains are totally impassable, except in certain parts, where there were gaps or depressions, to be reached only by going some hundred of miles out of the direct course. Well, now, what are we to do in such a case as this? How are you going to apply steam? Have you made anything like an estimate of the cost of a railroad running from here to the mouth of the Columbia? Why, the wealth of the Indies would be insufficient. You would have to tunnel through mountains five hundred or six hundred miles in extent. It is true they have constructed a tunnel beneath the Thames; but at a vast expenditure of capital. With a bankrupt treasury, and a depressed and suffering people, to talk about constructing a railroad to the western shore of this continent, manifests a wild spirit of adventure which I never expected to hear broached in the Senate of the United States. And is the Senate of the United States to be the last entrenchment where we are to find this wild spirit of adventure which has involved this country in ruin? I believe that the farmers, the honest cultivators of the soil, look now only to God in his mercy, and their own labor, to relieve them from the wretchedness in which the wild and visionary schemes of adventure have involved them.

Now, it is one of the most uncalculating measures which was ever brought before the Senate. For whose benefit are we bound to pass it? Who are to go there, along the line of military posts, and take possession of the only part of the territory fit to occupy—that part lying upon the seacoast, a strip less than one hundred miles in width; for, as I have already stated, the rest of the territory consists of mountains almost inaccessible, and low lands which are covered with stone and volcanic remains, where rain never falls, except during the spring; and even on the coast no rain falls from April to October, and for the remainder of the year there is nothing but rain. Why, sir, of what use will this be for agricultural purposes? I would not for that purpose give a pinch of snuff for the whole territory. I wish to God we did not own it. I wish it was an impassable barrier to secure us against the intrusion of others. This is the character of the country. Who are we to send there? Do you think your honest farmers in Pennsylvania, New York, or even Ohio or Missouri, will abandon their farms to go upon any such enterprise as this? God forbid! If any man who is to go to that country, under the temptations of this bill, was my child—if he was an honest and industrious man, I would say to him, for God sake, do not go there. You will not better your condition. You will exchange the comforts of home, and the happiness of civilized life, for the pains and perils of a precarious existence. But if I had a son whose conduct was such as made him a fit subject for Botany Bay, I would say, in the name of God, go. This is my estimate of the importance of the settlement. Now, what are we to gain by making the settlement? In what shape are our expenditures there to be returned? When are we to get any revenue from the citizens of ours who go to that distant territory—3,300 miles from the seat of Government, as I have it from the Senator from Missouri? What return are they going to make us for protecting them with military posts, at an expense at the outset of $900,000, and swelling hereafter God knows how much—probably equalling the annual expenses of the Florida war. What will they return us for this enormous expense, after we have tempted them, by this bill, to leave their pursuits of honest industry, to go upon this wild and gambling adventure, in which their blood is to be staked?

Sir, does any man suppose that, in the next twenty years, we shall derive a cent of revenue? I put it to the Senate, Is there a man here who supposes that the wealth or power of the United States will be increased to the amount of one solitary cent by all the colonists that may be prevailed upon to go there? No, sir, not a cent. Well, now, make a moderate estimate; what do you think it will cost, on the scale on which you set out, during the next twenty years? Why, if you get off with ten millions of dollars, it will be about what any reasonable man would consider a proper estimate. The country is inhabited by fierce and warlike savages. It is a country abounding with recesses to which they can retreat, and in which they will be inaccessible; and if we ever get to war with them, (and we know by experience that the most certain way to get to war is to go among them,) we shall find another Florida; and every person knows how much the expenses of that unfortunate war had exceeded the anticipations of those who foreboded the worst. Sir, the interests of the people of the United States, throwing out of view the ardent and unpatriotic desire of adventurers, and consulting the solid interests of the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country,) I venture to say that, for the next twenty years, there is not a congressional district in this Union, costing the Government nothing, but, on the contrary, contributing to its support, which will not be more valuable to the United States than the whole of this territory. It never can be of any value for agricultural purposes.

All the accounts I have read concur, without any dissenting voice, in stating that the fur-trade is in rapid course of deterioration. The animals which yield furs are disappearing; and the time is not remote when even the British fur company will abandon the country, if you leave them alone. So you have a prospect, by the mere lapse of time—by the mere progress of events—by the extermination of animals—of having the territory dropped into our possession. But, if the British had no claim to this territory, and there were nothing which impelled us to go with our military establishments and agricultural settlements, I would not consent—if there was an embankment of even five feet to be removed, I would not consent to expend five dollars to remove that embankment to enable our population to go there. I do not wish to tempt the people to form settlements there. I wish this to be a great empire, grown up by the natural course of civilization, and the natural extension of population. I thank God for his mercy in placing the Rocky Mountains there. I believe, if it had not been for those mountains, we would have been already in the Pacific. You cannot civilize men, if they have an indefinite extent of territory over which to spread their numbers; for so long as they spread their numbers, instead of becoming civilized, they become semi-savage. All agree that civilization can best be effected when the country is hedged in by narrow boundaries.

Why, Mr. President, if there is any one lesson inculcated by history, beyond the possibility of doubt, it is that all nations of the world which have within the last one or two centuries sent out distant colonies, have found them to be far more expensive than profitable. There is nothing which can justify such an enterprise, but the existence of a superabundant and starving population. In our case there is no such necessity. Are we pent up within narrow limits?—are we stifled for air?—are we starving for want of means of subsistence? Why, sir, we are very much distressed, to be sure; but it is from plethora, not from consumption. We are now in a condition in which a Senator from Kentucky, in discussing the tariff bill, told us we were, and that is—in a most deplorable condition. The barns were full—were breaking down with the weight of grain; the country was overburdened with a superabundance of all the means of human subsistence. This is the case now. In the history of the United States, a period was never known of such an abundance of everything necessary to support human life—corn selling for ten to twelve and a half cents a bushel; wheat at forty cents, and every other article of consumption in proportion;—and with a country like this, and with a soil as productive as the valleys of Egypt, and so extensive that you cannot people it for a century to come,—with such a soil, and such means for rewarding the honest agricultural laborer, shall we, at an enormous expense, derived from taxes upon the labor of the industrious, indulge the whims and caprices of the adventurous portion of the population, who love to roam over the mountains? It is not proper to hold out such inducements to our citizens to engage in these adventurous pursuits. There are no advantages to be derived from them. The advantages of the fur trade have been highly extolled; but I have seen no results but the enormous wealth of John Jacob Astor, and one or two others, to justify the commendation. Are the honest mechanic and agriculturist, engaged in the honest pursuits of industry, to be taxed, that inducements may be held out to the adventurous to engage in this trade, which has enriched so few?

Have you read the account of Astor's adventures in the fur trade? You will there find that the most of his operators were foreigners and the half-breed Indians. There were no citizens of the United States employed by him; and by this bill you will induce none of your citizens to embark but those of an adventurous character—those who have nothing to lose. I cannot think any man who has a strong feeling of patriotism—who has a heart bound to his country as it ought to be, and endearing associations inseparably connected with home—would abandon his friends and family, and all endeared to him, to emigrate to that country. No, sir; captivating as it may be to one portion of the Union, this is a spirit we ought not to encourage: we ought rather to induce the honest and industrious classes to remain among us, and contribute to the support of their Government.

But, in the ardor with which gentlemen have been drawn into the discussion of this question, they seem to have totally overlooked a very important matter—the ways and means. Do we so abound in financial resources, as to be able, at this particular moment, to appropriate $900,000 to a scheme of this kind? Have gentlemen considered the question of ways and means? I have not heard a single individual, in the course of the debate, make the slightest reference to the pecuniary means of this country to justify such an appropriation. I must, however, except the Senator from New Hampshire. At the close of his remarks, he made a slight allusion to our finances, rather with a view of showing that, as bad as they were, we might make the appropriation necessary to carry the plan into operation. That gentleman was himself Secretary of the Treasury, at a period of great financial embarrassment; and the tribulation to which he was then exposed, no doubt, brought him to sympathize with the present Secretary of that Department, and to consider the importance of having ways and means; and the still greater importance of prosecuting this measure, whether you have the ways and means or not. Well, sir, two great political parties are now contending for power. They have both, in some degree, adopted the same watchword—economy and retrenchment. That was the sign under which the Whigs conquered in 1840; it is the sign under which the Republicans hope to conquer now. Hitherto, on this subject, we have had nothing but words. I have not seen the slightest effort to establish, in the administration of this Government, any system of economy. I have not witnessed any apparent misgiving in the minds of Senators who are favorable to the adoption of this measure, as to the deficient condition of the finances. I confidently believe that we will not have a sufficiency of means to carry on the Government, and to pay the ordinary demands which are contracted on its behalf. The expenditure which the Government is required to make will not leave, at the end of the year, anything to be applied to the object contemplated in this bill.

I have seen a statement of the probable amount of the imports of the last quarter, purporting to come from a person who investigated the subject thoroughly, and who had the means to investigate it; and the result was, that the probable amount of the whole imports for that period would be little more than eight millions of dollars. What does this indicate? A state of things which, of all others, calls upon us to pause.

What is the condition of this Government? Who is it that rules? Who is responsible for the measures adopted here? Nobody, sir. We are in a state of interregnum. Nobody is responsible. For God's sake, let us postpone measures of this kind until there is somebody in the Government responsible. The Executive is exerting, no doubt, the best of his powers to do something; but he is not sustained by the other branches of the Legislature. Neither of the great parties seems to have any sympathy for the Executive. They stand by, and fold their arms. If you should say to either of them, you have appropriated $900,000 without having the means to meet that appropriation, they would say it does not concern us; it belongs to the other party to provide the ways and means. For God's sake, then, let us not adopt equivocal measures of this kind when there is no party responsible for anything. Wait a year or two. Within that period you will have a chance of having that territory gained by amicable negotiation. Within that period you will certainly have somebody at the head of this Government—whether Democratic or Whig—of sufficient power to assume the responsibility of the measures adopted for administering the Government. I beseech you now, by every consideration connected with the national welfare, to pause. The time will come when it will be proper to act. I think, of all times, this is the most inappropriate; and I say, emphatically, pause before you proceed further in this matter.

Mr. LINN remarked that it was his wish to close the debate on this subject; and, unless some other Senator desired to address the Senate then, he would move to pass over the bill, informally, till to-morrow. He made that motion, and it was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the bill for the payment of seven companies of Georgia militia, for services rendered in 1840 and 1841.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved an amendment, to come in at the end of the bill, appropriating $19,399 87 out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to satisfy the claims involved in the bill; which was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, the bill for repairing and repaving a portion of Pennsylvania avenue was taken up, and recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution authorizing the establishing of agencies for water-rotted hemp.

Mr. KING thought it better to go on with the regular orders, and let the resolution come up in its order.

Messrs. CRITTENDEN and SEVIER remarked that the subject was one of exceeding interest and importance to two or three States in the Union, and hoped the resolution would be considered at once.

The question was put on the motion to take up the resolution, and decided in the negative—ayes 13, nays 14.

On motion by Mr. GRAHAM, it was ordered that the petition of D. G. Skinner be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill for the relief of Charles J. Jenkins and William W. Mann, assignees of John McKinne, was taken up, as in committee of the whole; and, after a few remarks by Messrs. KING and HUNTINGTON in opposition, and by Mr. BERRIEN in favor of its passage, it was postponed till Friday next.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 25, 1843.

Mr. READ presented a petition, signed by sundry citizens of northern Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a bill for the relief of Richard Steel; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. WISE, from a select committee appointed at the last session, and reappointed at the present one, reported a bill to establish a Government office for printing, binding, &c., and for other purposes; which was read twice, ordered to be printed, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUSHING submitted a letter which he had received from Mr. Cunard, of Halifax, Nova Scotia, which corrected an error into which he had fallen, in a report he had made on the subject of British colonial trade.

THE EXCHEQUER.

Mr. FILLMORE insisted upon the orders of the day, and objected to all other business, the solicitations of various members to the contrary notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER, therefore, decided that the exchequer was the subject in order.

Mr. PICKENS inquired if it overrode the business of the morning hour, during which the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] respecting the bill to refund to General Jackson the amount of his fine, was in order; and as it had been discussed for several weeks, he hoped the House would proceed with, and dispose of it.

The SPEAKER replied that, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] insisted upon the order of the day, the reports and accompanying resolution on the exchequer scheme overrode all other business, as that subject was before the House, under a suspension of the rules; and on that question, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] was entitled to the floor.

The question was therefore taken up. It stands thus:

The Committee of Ways had Means had reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the plan of an exchequer presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session of Congress, entitled "A bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department," ought not to be adopted:

To which resolution Mr. ATHERTON, from the minority committee, had moved the following amendment:

And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill regulating the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys, in such a manner as shall, as far as possible, substitute provisions of law for executive discretion in the management of the finances; shall prevent the moneys of the people from being used for purposes of private speculation and emolument, and shall render the Government independent of the agency and influence of moneyed corporations.

And Mr. CUSHING had moved to amend the resolution of Mr. FILLMORE, by striking out after the word "ought" the word "not;" [so as to make the proposition affirmative, instead of negative. This motion, the reader will recollect, had been originally submitted by Mr. EVERETT; but withdrawn by him.]

So the pending question was on the amendment of Mr. CUSHING.

Mr. BARNARD said if he supposed that the action of this House on the subject of the currency was to end with the vote to be taken on the resolutions now on the table, he should not trouble the House with any remarks on the subject; he should content himself with recording his vote on that proposition, and with referring to the very able report made by the Committee of Ways and Means, as that report furnished abundant reasons and arguments for his justification. Though he felt bound to say at the same time that there were perhaps positions and arguments in that report, from which, if that were the question before the House, he should feel himself bound to dissent; but his hope and trust was, that when this House should definitively have acted on the proposition before them, they would then proceed to some positive and affirmative action upon the subject of the currency. He hoped and trusted that this House would not content itself with the negative proposition now before it. He held it to be proper for the House to act on this subject in the form in which it had been presented by the Committee of Ways and Means; but he held it also to be proper, and the bounden duty of the House, after that action should be passed, to proceed, if possible, to mature some measure of relief for the country. He believed such a thing was practicable; and whatever was practicable for the House to do on this important subject, and whatever it could do without a sacrifice of principle, for the relief both of the Government and of the country, he held that this House was bound to do. And so far as he was concerned, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] need be under no apprehension that he (Mr. B.) entertained any disposition to stop with the action of the House on this subject; and he gave that gentleman notice now, that if he did not himself move to go into Committee of the Whole on his bill, he (Mr. B.) would himself move it, and urge it on the House at the earliest possible time.

Mr. WISE. Why did you not do it before? We have been urging you all along.

Mr. BARNARD (without noticing the observation of the gentleman from Virginia) continued. And he would do that, not with the remotest idea that the House would entertain that gentleman's bill, but that, after the House had condemned his bill; along with that presented from the Secretary of the Treasury, it would be the most convenient mode of getting at another proposition which he should feel it his duty to present to, and urge upon, the House. It was his purpose to refer, before he concluded his remarks, to the measure to which he had just alluded; and the observations he might feel bound to make on the proposition now before them, would be made chiefly with a view of preparing, so far as he could do by his remarks, the mind of the House for action on that measure which he should present.

The present Congress had twice presented to the President of the United States a measure of its own on the subject of finance and currency, and that measure had twice been rejected. The President of the United States had presented his plan of finance. At the last session of Congress they gave that plan a silent veto; at the present session, they proposed to give it a positive veto, according to the forms prescribed and the powers conferred by the Constitution. When that should be done, then perhaps the House might see that the decks were clear, and that it would be competent for them to look about and see by what measures they should steer and guide the vessel for the conclusion of a safer voyage. He repeated that the President of the United States had vetoed their measure of finance and currency; and they had vetoed, and proposed again to veto, the President's measure of finance and currency; by which, so far as he was concerned, he intended that the President of the United States, and his friends on this floor, should understand that the Congress of the United States was as much of "a constitutional fact" as the President of the United States.

When the county had a United States bank, it was found capable of performing certain offices and functions for the Government and the country. The President of the United States proposed by his plans that the same important offices and functions should be performed: he proposed his plan, therefore, as a substitute for a bank of the United States. That those offices and functions could be performed in another way, everybody could see when they examined a plan which would be submitted to the country.

There was only one mode in which the important functions of keeping and disbursing the public moneys could be performed without the use of a national bank, or the State banks. This mode was, that the Executive should perform those offices and services itself. This was what was proposed by the plan of the Executive. It proposed to perform all the duties connected with the financial department of the Government, by the agency of officers appointed by the President, under the Constitution; that the Government should keep, transfer, and disburse its own revenues; that it should perform the duties of commissioners of loans and pension agents; that it should receive deposites, issue a currency for the country, and supply commercial exchanges. All these functions were proposed to be performed, by the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury. What was the proposed board of exchequer? He answered, an executive department of the Government; or a branch of an executive department, composed of officers appointed by the President—just such a department, in fact, as the Post Office, the General Land Office, the Bounty Land Office, the Pension Office, the War or Navy Department.

It must be obvious that a portion of the duties proposed to be performed by the exchequer were competent to be performed by it; whilst there was no competency whatever for the remainder. There was a competency to keep and disburse the public moneys, to make loans, and to give the paper of the Government as evidence of debt, and perhaps to issue such paper in a form to circulate as money—although he would never invest the Executive with any such authority, except in cases of great exigency. But there was something more proposed by this exchequer. It proposed to receive deposites, to issue convertible paper to circulate as money, and to deal in commercial exchanges. So far as the proposition to receive deposites and deal in exchanges was concerned, he must declare his conviction that there was no power in the Government for the performance of such functions. It was true that the Government might deal with individuals on Government account, but not with individuals on individual account.

In the first place, then, taken as a whole, the proposed exchequer was a subordinate executive department of the Government—an executive treasury, with sub-treasuries, or branches. In the second place, it was an executive commercial bank of deposite and exchange. For the first, there was a competency; for the second, none whatever. But he had serious objections to the establishment of an executive treasury. He would mention one now, which condemned the whole scheme—and that was, the simple fact that it proposed that the surplus revenues of the country should be kept in the hands of executive officers, instead of being deposited in banks. What was the history of the keeping of the public money since the foundation of our Government? At the first session after the adoption of the Constitution, in 1789, a law was passed requiring the Treasurer of the United States to be the keeper of the public moneys. It did not prescribe the place or mode of keeping them. That was left to the Treasurer's own discretion. Understanding that there was but one mode, the Treasurer adopted that. There were three or four State banks: and these he adopted as his depositories; and did not, for a moment, keep the money in his own possession. At the second session of Congress, the Bank of the United States was chartered; and it afforded further opportunities to the Treasurer for making deposites. The law did not require him to make it a depository; yet he did so—not dispensing with the agency of the State banks. Thus the matter went on till 1794, when a committee was appointed to examine the Treasurer's accounts—who reported that all the functions of the Treasury Department connected with the transfer, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public moneys, were satisfactorily performed by banks. (Mr. B. read an extract from their report.) That committee proposed no action, being satisfied with the mode of proceeding adopted by the Treasurer. Things thus went on until 1811, when the charter of the old bank expired, and when resort was again had to the State banks. The Treasurer then had about two hundred to select from. It was the period of the war, when all the banks of the country south of New England suspended specie payments. Notwithstanding this fact, the Treasurer continued to deposite in them, knowing that the banks were just as sound after, as before they suspended. In 1816, the second Bank of the United States was incorporated, and then Congress for the first time undertook to legislate in relation to the mode of keeping the public moneys, by appointing the Bank of the United States as the depository. It was not so much for the safety of the public funds, as for the benefit of the bank, in consideration of the heavy bonuses exacted of it and paid for the charter. The bank then became the depository, and no further legislation was had until 1836. In 1833, however, the Executive undertook to interfere, and took the public money out of the control of law, to put it in the hands of officers of its own appointment. In 1836, Congress, in consequence of the largely accumulated amount of revenue in the hands of the Executive, passed a law on the subject. But, even then, the mode of keeping the public money was not changed; but the Secretary of the Treasury was merely required to select certain banks in which the Treasurer was to deposite. In 1837, a suspension of specie payments, more general than that which occurred during the war, took place; and the opportunity was seized to introduce a new mode of keeping the funds of the Government. Mr. Van Buren called Congress together, and proposed his sub-treasury, or (as his friends delighted to call it) the independent treasury. This was not adopted until the last year of his administration. It went into operation on the 4th of July, 1840, and remained in operation just one year. In the mean time, Mr. Van Buren lost his office on that very measure; for the political revolution of 1840 turned on it more than on everything else that entered into the contest. It was repealed, and, with it, the law of 1836; thus leaving matters as they stood under the act of 1839. There was no surplus revenue to tempt the banks to corruption; and it was thought that the funds of the Government might be safely left to the Secretary of the Treasury. The terms on which the banks kept the money had been reported by the Secretary of the Treasury; and from that report, it would be found that it was deposited in banks to the credit of the "Treasurer of the United States," and could not be drawn, except by warrants according to law. This was the system in operation now; and the system which had been in operation, with the exception of one year, since the foundation of the Government. Why, then, should we be asked, after an experience of 52 years out of 53, to change the mode of keeping the public money, which had been found to work so well? Was there anything in the system of Mr. Van Buren, as demonstrated during one year's operation, to induce the country to think it ought to be adopted again? He thought that the public money should be kept as prudent and discreet individuals would keep theirs. The practice of depositing in bank was almost universal—was like the maxims of the common law—was founded in wisdom, and had the approval of nearly every man of ordinary understanding. How, he asked, was it with States? Did any State in the Union permit its funds to be kept in the personal custody of its officers? How was it with counties, private associations, and courts intrusted with the care of money? Did any of them employ personal agents? And why was the United States Government alone called on to adopt a new mode of proceeding? He did not think that Government officers were more to be trusted than agents of private associations.

Had not this Government had its abundant share of dishonest and unfaithful officers? There was nothing in the nature of public service which guarantied fidelity. It was not the best men who seek office, nor the most faithful who obtain it. It was the bold, desperate, and reckless, who were crowding all the avenues to public employment; and it was this description of persons, in a great degree, who were the most successful in obtaining it. He doubted if the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States was ever worse served in the article of faithful and honest agents, than the Government of the United States had been during the last twelve years. Yet they were called on, under these circumstances, and with all the experience of the Government, to change the mode in which the public money had been kept since the commencement of the Government. On his soul, he believed that public office in this country was the worst school of morals this side of the penitentiary. Many an honest man was matriculated in office, who graduated a rogue; and, if the rogue got in, he was ten times a rogue. He should not consent, for one, to change that mode of keeping our surplus moneys, which was the universal practice of the country. There was something in the nature of money itself, and particularly of public money, which ought to forbid its being intrusted to individuals.

After commenting on the objectionable features of a Government bank, which were presented by the bill of the select committee, Mr. B. went on to say that, by that bill, there was to be a redemption fund of twenty millions of dollars kept constantly on hand in the exchequer. He did not hesitate to say that, under this plan, if it should go into successful operation, there would pass through the hands of these Government officers, in one single year, upwards of fifty millions of dollars.

There were other points in regard to this Executive treasury and sub-treasury scheme which he should be glad to notice if he had time; but he must hurry on.

He begged leave to say a few words in regard to this treasury board and its agencies, considered as a commercial bank. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] took the ground, yesterday, that it was not a commercial bank; that it was not a bank at all, nor anything like a bank; that, if there were banking powers conferred by this scheme, the Treasury Department had banking powers already, because it received deposites, made transfers of the public money, and dealt in exchanges, by buying and selling drafts. Now, put all that out of view that belonged to an executive treasury, and did not belong to a bank; and still this was a Government bank. By this exchequer, the Government was to deal with individuals, not on Government account. By it, the Government agreed to receive from individuals fifteen millions of dollars, for which it was to give bank money—viz: certificates of deposite;—and yet the gentleman said that it was not a bank. He should be glad if the gentleman would tell them what the Bank of Amsterdam was. That bank received deposites in gold and silver, and made its profits by issues of paper, in the form of certificates of deposite. It never loaned a dollar, nor did it deal in exchanges at all. The Bank of Hamburg operated precisely in the same way, and in no other. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] with all his learning and knowledge on the subject, could get up and gravely tell the House that this was not a bank. But this bank was to deal in exchanges. In the first place, it was to buy bills of exchange, and there was no limit to the amount it might purchase. It was restricted in its dealings from State to State, and State to Territory; and it was restricted as to the time of the bills; beyond this, there was no limitation. It may also buy this exchange in the way of discount, because the bill expressly provides that it was not to take more than six per cent. for exchange, nor to give more than 2½ per cent. premium on the bills it might purchase. It might deal upon this subject in the way of favor to those who were its friends, and to frown down and oppress those who were not. Then, it had the power of selling exchange; and here, again, it was unlimited. It might draw and redraw to the amount of millions. It might also sell cheaper to its friends, and refuse to sell to those who were not. After this description he had given of this commercial bank of exchange, he should like to see any gentleman get up and say that it was not a bank. He knew that this Government might create a bank, if it should be found necessary for the management of its finances, and necessary for the commerce and business of the country; but he denied that the Government could, by its own officers, carry out all the objects and purposes of a bank. He did not believe that there was any individual in that House who would rise in his place and advocate such an institution; yet there it was proposed by the Executive, and urged by his friends on that floor, that the Government should, by its own officers, set up a great Government bank of deposite and exchange, and deal with individuals for profit. In conclusion, Mr. B. observed that he had only time to say that, at the proper time, he should urge upon the House to go into Committee of the Whole upon the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts, for the purpose of moving, as an amendment to it, the simple plan of furnishing a currency for the Government and the people.

Mr. WINTHROP observed that it was with extreme reluctance he had made up his mind to address the House on this subject. There was an old proverb, which said, "out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh;" but he had no fulness of the heart to speak on this subject. It was so hackneyed, worn out, and embarrassed by the various and complicated questions that were connected with it, that he could not conceive how any man could speak on it without repugnance. This subject of the currency had been tossed, for the past ten years, on the waves of party contention; and when a few years since they thought they were about coming into port with it, and hailed what the man from the mast-head thought to be land, they found, to their sorrow, what they took to be land to be nothing but a fresh reef of rocks; and if he might be permitted to pursue the figure further, he would add, that the subject of the currency had become as stale as a piece of mouldy biscuit after the voyage.

As there were likely to be questions, before this debate was brought to a close, upon which any vote he might give would be liable to be mistaken, he was not content to leave his constituents without some explanation in regard to the votes he might give. The challenge had been given by several gentlemen, and repeated by the gentleman who had just taken his seat, for any one to rise in his place, and declare that he was in favor of this project of the Executive. He did not rise to accept that challenge.

Mr. BARNARD said that he withdrew the challenge.

Mr. WINTHROP. Well, if the gentleman withdraws it, the House will bear me witness that the challenge has been repeatedly made by others. He was not prepared to take up the gauntlet, and defend the project of the Executive of the last session; but still he could not say that he was in favor of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. He was ready to avow that, if the resolution concluding that report should be forced on him, his vote must be given against it.

Before he entered on the question embraced in that resolution, he wished to give his views briefly on the subject of the currency, and the present regulations for the management of the finances. Referring to the law of 1789, providing for the custody of the public money, Mr. W. said that there was now no other regulation by law on the subject, but that it was left entirely to the discretion of the Executive. For his own part, he could not feel that he had discharged his duty to the people, by omitting to vote, on every occasion, for bringing the public treasure under the custody of the law. Did gentlemen tell him that they had repeatedly tried to accomplish that desirable object, and been prevented by the vetoes of the Executive? He was no apologist for vetoes; but because the Executive, either from conscience or contumacy, had seen fit to refuse his sanction to the measures they had passed, was that a sufficient reason why Congress should forbear to make another attempt? We are (said Mr. W.) the representatives of the people, and are bound to continue our efforts to place their money under the control of law; and if there be any distrust of the Executive—if there be any well-founded alarm as to his objects and aims, so much the more necessary is it that we should pass some law to limit his discretion, and place the custody of the public funds under the proper safeguards of law. We have now (said Mr. W.) that union of the purse and the sword, so much deprecated at the time when General Jackson removed the public deposites from the Bank of the United States. If there must be such a union, he preferred that it should be under the sanction of law. He knew that, as yet, no injury had resulted from this union; but our poverty had been our protection; our coffers were so empty, that it mattered little who kept the keys. The time, however, might come when the case would be different. He had no apprehension that this tariff, about which there had been such ominous predictions, was to prove so ruinous to our revenue. He believed, after time had been given to the people to consume the stock of goods on hand, that our revenues would be greatly increased under its operations; and if the rigors of the cash system should be mitigated by the warehousing system, that, with a moderate duty on tea and coffee, would, before the close of the next session of Congress, bring up a different and more prosperous state of our finances than was now presented.

But, at any rate, whether full or empty—whether exhausted or exuberant—he held it to be Whig doctrine—he held it to be republican doctrine—he held it to be constitutional doctrine—that the treasures of the nation should be under better sanctions and guards than he thought they now were. He had no hesitation in saying that a national bank, with a moderate capital of $10,000,000, $15,000,000, or even $20,000,000, which experience had shown was necessary, was his first choice for a fiscal agent for the Government. The profligate mismanagement of such an institution had not impaired his confidence in a United States bank, any more than the monstrous misrule of this Government, for the last ten years, had impaired his confidence in the free institutions and the admirable forms of government under which we live. And such a moment as the present he thought the most favorable for the establishment of such an institution as the one he had suggested; for, with the evils attendant on the mismanagement of the late bank before them, they would be likely to secure it on such a safe and sure foundation as would save it from such evils in future; but, at the same time, he confessed that, with such principles as the President held, the course he (Mr. WINTHROP) suggested was rendered an altogether impracticable idea at the present moment.

But that was not the only course to be pursued: there were others, which might and ought to be tried, until the object could be accomplished. Why, if the House would do nothing else, it might call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to put in black and white, and submit it for their amendment and adoption, as a working plan, the system which was now pursued for the collection, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public money. Any system—even a bad system—resting on a written law, was better than one resting only on Executive discretion, or than no system at all. So strong did he regard the necessity of some provision for the safekeeping and disbursement of the public money, that, for one, he regretted that even the sub-treasury system was repealed as summarily as it was. Odious and abhorrent as that system was, he doubted, if it could be brought to a vote, that it would be repealed at this moment, if it was now standing. And in justice to his friends in that House, he would say—and he should tell no secrets by doing so—that on the floor of either House, at the extra session, the repeal of the sub-treasury, as an independent outright act, was not one of the propositions of the party then in power. They had been charged at sundry times, and in divers places, with perplexing and embarrassing the President at the extra session; but he had already said that he concurred in no such charges. There was some ground for another charge, which came from a gentleman from Virginia the other day—that there was a too great willingness to comply with the wishes and desires of the President; and that the sub-treasury repeal, as an independent act, was a measure more as compliance and complaisance to him. The United States bank bill was under consideration, and the signature of the President to that bill would have repealed the sub-treasury, and his veto would have left it standing; but it seemed as if the non-repeal of that system would make the President responsible for leaving the sub-treasury in operation, or force him to sign the bank charter; and it was thought better to relieve him from such a predicament. With this view, the repeal bill was introduced, and it was hurried hastily through; and he (Mr. W.) could not but regret that it was so. He could hardly help saying, if it were to do over again, he would not give his vote in favor of the repeal.

After some further observations in continuation of that subject, he proceeded to observe that he did not hold, nor did his friends hold, that it was the duty of the Government to take care of itself, and leave the people to take care of themselves; and he was for doing as much as he constitutionally could for the relief of the people, as well as of the Government; and he confessed that the issue of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 of exchequer notes, redeemable in specie at New York alone, or at New York and some one or two other places, he was opinion, would, in some measure, relieve the country. Government paper was not in favor with him, but they had been living on it for five years past. He did not agree with the gentlemen who regarded Government paper, resting on dollar for dollar, as altogether worthless. It seemed the gentlemen forgot one of their old arguments, which they had been accustomed to use in relation to the hard-money doctrines of years past, when they preferred paper money on a specie basis, if they now spurned it as contemptible and worthless. It would be a great convenience as a medium of local payments, as a medium of treasury payments, and as a medium of exchange. The treasury notes now in use were found everywhere of great convenience in all those respects. But he was not unwilling to say that there were other parts of the exchequer projet that he looked at with less favor: he referred particularly to that part which had been commented on by his friend who last addressed the House—the power to be given to buy bills of exchange generally. He agreed that that power would be liable to many abuses. After some observations on this point, he proceeded to say that he had no fancy for resting the operation of the proposed system on the assent of the States; but, on all these features and parts of this subject, he intended to hold himself at liberty to act as he might think wise and proper, under existing circumstances, when that bill should come before the House for its action.

He had said enough to show that a national bank was his first choice as a fiscal agent for the Government; and while he was not prepared to give in his adhesion to the Executive for it, he was ready (if nothing better presented itself) to vote for the House bill, rather than continue the present system; and, in doing so, he believed he should vote for what many believed to be harmless, and for what some believed to be beneficial.

He desired now to allude briefly to the reports and the resolutions before them; but, before doing so, he begged leave to bear his humble testimony, in the most unqualified terms, to the ability and fidelity with which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had discharged his duty to the country in reference to this matter. After a warm eulogy of that gentleman, he proceeded to his report, which seemed to cut off all hope of such an institution as was proposed, without the greatest danger. The report said:

"It must be obvious to every intelligent man, who will carefully examine the plan here shadowed forth, that, if this institution be ever legalized, and put in operation under the Executive authority of the Government, it will exert a power and influence, for good or for evil, upon the business and politics of this country, compared with which a bank of the United States, or the sub-treasury, would be impotent and harmless. If it were possible to have such an institution without increasing Executive power, or endangering the treasury, which should be administered by men of undoubted talents and integrity, endued with competent financial skill, and a cautious, vigilant sagacity, uncontaminated with political and partisan bias, it is undoubtedly capable of rendering some service both to the business wants of the country and the financial embarrassments of the treasury. But to hope for this, is to expect a change in human nature itself, and in the ordinary motives that govern the conduct of men, and especially political men, little less than miraculous. Our institutions are based upon no such theory of human perfectibility. They contemplate the possibility of error and vice in those who are intrusted with power, and therefore guard the trust by every limitation, as to time and amount, not incompatible with the object to be attained."

It appeared to him (Mr. W.) that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] had run into the extreme, and too much into the theory of human depravity. It appeared to him that that gentleman had taken for his text, when he wrote his report, the remark of an ancient philosopher, who said

"the only safety in relation to human government is distrust, distrust, distrust;" or the language of a Roman poet, "una salus, nullam sperare salutem."

He (Mr. W.) did not deny that there was something of distrust necessary in relation to human Governments, and particularly free Governments; but he also undertook to say, that some degree of confidence was not only useful, but indispensable, even to the existence of free Governments. It was true, our institutions were not based on human perfectibility, but were based on integrity, on education, on morality, and on virtue. Montesquieu said the foundation principle of monarchy was fear; but of a republic, virtue; and if virtue followed not their counsels, he (Mr. W.) feared it was vain to attempt to guard their institutions from overthrow, or, in other language, "If the Lord keep not the city, the watchmen wake but in vain."

He admitted they had of late had no very great encouragement there to place implicit confidence in men; he admitted they had seen some demonstrations which might have served reasonably to check their confidence. But he was not ready to admit that the age of virtuous politicians was fully gone; he could not agree with his friend from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] that public office was the best school for roguery and vice. He trusted they should yet live to see the day when they should have such men as they had in the earlier days of the Republic; and men, too, of more recent date, who should feel that, when they were called to the offices of the country, they were not called to some pitiful job, but to a sacred function—men whom he might address in the words, though not in the spirit, in which Macbeth was addressed by—that demi-demon, he had almost said, with which his destiny was associated—

"What thou would'st highly, that would'st thou holily.
Art not without ambition; but without
The illness should attend it."

At any rate, he, for one, was not ready at present to base our institutions or our system, or objections to systems, upon the absence of everything like public virtue. It was true, the report seemed to rest on the watchfulness and vigilance of stockholders; but where was their vigilance in the thousand and one institutions which had failed? Now, though the United States bank was his first choice, he did not say that it was the only means by which this Government could manage its affairs.

After remarking upon several passages at the close of the report made to the House by the Committee of Ways and Means, he expressed his regret that he should have to vote against the resolution of that committee. He believed that the proper course to have been pursued would have been to have laid the report of the committee on the table, as was the custom of the House with regard to adverse reports generally. At the same time that he advocated this course as the best that could be pursued, he designed to cast no imputation whatever upon the Committee of Ways and Means. He was unwilling to subject the motives of the majority of the House to perversion and misconstruction, by passing the resolution which had been reported. Pass that, and it would be said that the Whig party intended to cast reproach upon the author of the exchequer scheme. The cry would be raised, that the majority here intended to nail the project to the counter, or counterfeit coin. It would be said that the design was to hold up the plan to the country as one which had none so poor as to do it reverence. A thousand eyes were turned toward the proceedings of the Whigs in Congress, and he wished to afford no new motive for their further malignant gaze. He wished to take away everything that could be turned into a subject of misconstruction and invective.

He hoped he should be pardoned for saying a few words in relation to the author of the exchequer projet. He did not stand here as the defender of the Secretary of State. That man was one of his most distinguished constituents; and he felt it to be a duty which he owed to those he represented to say something of him. When he saw so much unmerited reproach cast upon him, he felt that it would be doing injustice to those who assembled in Faneuil Hall to hear him, did he return home without saying anything on the subject. He was not one of those who listened to the Faneuil Hall speech of the Secretary of State. He regretted that such a speech was then and there made. He dissented entirely from many parts of it—for instance: the charge that the Whigs of Massachusetts, by declaring a final separation from the President, had committed themselves to an indiscriminate warfare against all his measures, he thought, was not at all warranted by facts. The idea, too, that no peculiar party element entered into the passage of the tariff bill of last session, because some twenty or thirty Whigs found themselves so situated as to be obliged to vote against, whilst some ten or a dozen of the opposite party voted for it, was altogether absurd. Nor had the charge that the convention of the Whigs of Massachusetts had transcended their authority, by considering subjects not usual in such conventions, any foundation. But that the interrogatory "Where shall I go?" instead of being applicable to his relation to the Whigs of Massachusetts, whose confidence no man ever enjoyed in a more eminent degree than the Secretary of State, was dictated by a mere lust of office—a mere truckling to place and power—was as gross as it was unfounded. Indeed, the very next sentence of the speech forbade any such construction. He referred to the sentence where the Secretary declared that he was, and always should be, a Massachusetts Whig.

In relation to the subject before the House, he would declare that he was not unwilling to admit that there was something in the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who contended that there was an inconsistency between the speeches of Mr. Webster and the report on the subject of the exchequer. He should not undertake to explain away that inconsistency. But he would say that, in all Mr. Webster's discussions of the sub-treasury, his leading argument against it was, that it was an abandonment of the duty of the Government to regulate the exchanges and currency of the country. All his other objections were subordinate to this. Indeed, it was the burden of all his speeches; and he (Mr. W.) would remark, that there was no inconsistency between that view of the sub-treasury and Mr. Webster's views in relation to the exchequer. Although he disapproved of his position, yet he thought, when the Secretary of State was accused of inconsistency, he might reply, in the language of an ancient philosopher, "I may have acted contrary to myself, but never contrary to the republic."

He had no idea that Mr. Webster would thank him for what he had said here to-day, although he might say amen to some of his remarks; yet he had felt it to be a duty to those whom he represented to say what he had said—spurning alike misrepresentations and misconstructions which might be made here and at home.

Mr. T. F. MARSHALL next obtained the floor. He commenced by remarking that he had ventured, the other day, in reply to certain remarks of his friend and colleague—in which he [Mr. G. DAVIS] expressed the opinion that Mr. Webster was destitute of genius—to bring in a sketch of that great man's character. He did so, that he might be acquitted of having formed a preconceived judgment in relation to him. He should not have ventured to arraign the Secretary of State before the Whig party; for he apprehended that the Secretary would decline their jurisdiction. Were he (Mr. M.) to be judged, he would disclaim their jurisdiction. He did not, then, arraign him before the Whigs; because he, as well as the Secretary, would deny their jurisdiction. He arraigned him for a great and glaring departure, not from a sentence taken from a speech, but from the whole of the principles of his philosophy, and the leading principles of his life. He had been bold enough to term him his master. He did not mean thereby that he was his party master, whom he was bound to follow—not thinking that he was the incarnation of the principles of any political party, which he (Mr. M.) must obey. Thanks be to God, he knew no such master within the broad bounds of this republic! He meant to use the word in the same light as that in which Aristotle was the master of the Macedonian, Anaxagoras of the Athenian Pericles, and Socrates of the practical statesmen of Greece—not that he (Mr. M.) resembled Alexander, or Pericles, or Alcibiades, but that Mr. Webster combined the wisdom of all those philosophers. He referred to the pledge given in Faneuil Hall, when he pledged his reputation upon the policy of the exchequer. He was reported as meaning a sneer at the reputation of the Secretary of State, when his intention was the farthest possible from such a thing. In his judgment, the pledge of the reputation of the Massachusetts Senator would have outweighed all the jewelled diadems of Europe's proudest princes.

Inasmuch as the Government organ, in a strain more elevated and dignified than usual, had taken notice of his remarks, he would beg leave to read a passage from the Faneuil Hall speech to which he referred:

"The subject of the currency, gentlemen, has been the study of my life. Thirty years ago, a little before my entrance into the councils of the Government, the questions connected with a mixed currency, involving the proper relation of paper to specie, and the proper means of restricting an excessive issue of paper, came to be discussed by the most acute and well-disciplined understandings in England, in Parliament. At that time, during the suspension of specie payments by the banks, when paper was 15 per cent. below par, Mr. Vansittart had presented his celebrated resolution declaring that a bank note was still worth the value expressed on its face; that the bank note had not depreciated, but that the price of bullion had risen. Lord Liverpool and Lord Castlereagh espoused this view, as we know; and it was opposed by the close reasoning of Huskisson, the powerful logic of Horner, and the practical common sense of Alexander Baring (now Lord Ashburton.) [Applause.] The study of those debates made me a bullionist.

"They convinced me that paper could not circulate safely in any country, any longer than it was immediately redeemable at the place of its issue. Coming into Congress the very next year, or the next but one after, and finding the finances of the country in a most deplorable condition, I then, and ever after, bestowed myself, in preference to all other public topics, to the consideration of the questions relating to them. I believe I have read everything of value that has been published since on those questions, on either side of the Atlantic. I have studied, by close observation, the laws of paper currency as they have exhibited themselves in this and other countries, from 1811 down to the present time. I have expressed my opinions at various times in Congress; and some of the predictions which I have made have not been altogether falsified by subsequent events. I must, therefore, be permitted, gentlemen, without yielding to any flippant paragraph of a newspaper, or to the hasty ebullitions of debate in a public assembly, to say that I believe the plan for an exchequer, as presented to Congress at its last session, is the best measure—the only measure for the adoption of Congress, and the trial of the people. I am ready to stake my reputation, that if this Whig Congress will take that measure, and give it a fair trial, within three years it will be admitted by the whole American people to be the most beneficial measure of any sort ever adopted in this country, the Constitution only excepted." [Cheers.]

There were cheers (said Mr. M.) at that remark. But the Secretary of State goes on:

"I mean, that they should take it as it was when it came from the Cabinet; not as it looked when the committee of Congress had laid their hands upon it." [Laughter.]

And (said Mr. M.) marked it, according to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER.] [A laugh.]

"For when the committee of Congress had struck out the proviso respecting exchange, it was not worth a rush—it was not worth the parchment it would be engrossed on. The great desire of this country is a general currency, a facility of exchange; a currency which shall be the same for you, and for the people of Alabama and Louisiana; and a system of exchange which shall equalize credit between them and you, with the rapidity and facility with which steam conveys men and merhandise. This is what the country wants—what you want, and you have not got it."

Now, here was as full an endorsement as could have been given to any plan in any language. So careful was he in recommending the plan, that the Secretary took great pains to satisfy all how he became competent to decide; therefore, he mounted up to the sources of his information; and, in order to make his recommendation still more emphatic, he threw around it all the sanction of his name, and all the dignity of his knowledge and character. Consider, then, that this exchequer scheme was thus put forth as a great sanitive measure, and the best that could be adopted—the Constitution only excepted; it did become every man who had—as he said—known and had faith in Mr. Webster, to examine closely into a proposition coming to us with all these sanctions.

He did not know who was the writer of the newspaper article to which he referred, nor whether it was in order to refer to such articles in debate. But it had been done; and perhaps the peculiar style of this article would excuse it in the present instance. He did not know, as he said, who wrote the article; yet it was very much like something which he heard in a certain speech delivered on the floor of the House yesterday, (looking towards Mr. CUSHING.) Mr. M. then read a passage from the Madisonian, charging him with having shunned the true issue involved in the exchequer, and with having argued upon incorrect premises, &c.

When he asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] yesterday what he considered a bank to be, he refused to give any definition whatever, but said he was arguing negatively—a phrase which he confessed, in that connexion and in that application, did not define the gentleman's meaning with sufficient precision to make it intelligible to him. He had quoted heretofore on that floor, when the question of a Government bank was the very subject under consideration, some remarks of Mr. Webster, in which he denounced a Government bank as the very worst of all possible human inventions; yet Mr. Webster now offered them the same thing, declaring it to be the best contrivance which the wit of man had ever devised for this country, save and except only the Constitution of the United States. If this could be proved to be a Government bank, then Mr. Webster stood convicted of having, when in power, offered for this country the very worst experiment which foreign nations had ever tried. Now the gentleman from Massachusetts defined a bank to be a joint-stock company of private individuals, dealing in money and exchanges for profit; and if this were true, there could be no such thing as a Government bank.

Mr. CUSHING. I did not give any definition of my own of a bank. I did say that, in the popular acceptation of the term, a bank was a joint-stock company of individuals, doing business for profit.

Mr. MARSHALL said that he understood a bank to consist not so much in the persons who exercised the powers and faculties with which it was vested, as in the nature of its powers and faculties. A bank might be in the hands of individuals incorporated or not; or in the hands of a single individual, who issued his own notes; or it might be in the hands of the Government; and banks might have various faculties. The Bank of Amsterdam, for instance, was a bank of deposite, issuing certificates of deposite for the money received by it—which was counted by weight, and not by tale; while the certificates that were given to the depositors expressed the amount in weight, and not in the number and size of the worn and defaced pieces of gold and silver which made it up. It was simply a place of deposite; and yet it was called a bank. What was the institution proposed by the Executive? It was a moneyed institution. It was a bank of deposite, having ten millions of Government money placed under the control of its directors—for what? For paying the expenses of the Government? No. It was for the purpose of dealing with the affairs of individuals, for profit. He asked gentlemen, if there was a bank incorporated, with ten millions of capital, with power to receive deposites and deal in exchanges, whether it would be a bank or not.

He thought every one would say that it was a bank. Well, then, if this same thing, conducted by the officers of the Government, possessed the same powers and faculties, was it not also a bank? Mr. Webster had, at times, exercised an extraordinary influence over the minds of the people of this country on questions of this sort. He knew that there was a strong party in favor of this project in his own State; and, therefore, the opinions of Mr. Webster, in regard to a Government bank, were worthy of consideration at this time. In one of his speeches Mr. W. said (speaking of a Government bank) that it was an experiment that had never been tried in this country; but the experience of other countries in which it had been tried demonstrated that it was, of all human inventions, the very worst. That was the position in which Mr. Webster placed himself in regard to a bank of the United States.

After continuing his argument to prove that the exchequer plan of the President was the very identical Government bank which Mr. Webster so much denounced, Mr. M. went on, as he said, to speak of principles and of men. It had been the fashion to charge the Whig party as being led by a dictator, in opposition to the President, for the purpose of embarrassing him and his measures. He had quarrelled with the dictator, and was likely to come by the worst of it; but it was not that, that he quarrelled with him for. He quarrelled with him because he was unwilling to surrender his constitutional views at the foot of the throne; because he was unwilling to give up everything on the bank bill that it was worth. He knew nothing of any private matters between Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay. If Mr. Webster chose to consider Mr. Clay as his rival for the Presidency, that was no affair of his. If he lacked confidence in Mr. Clay, that was no ground of dispute with him, (Mr. M.) But if he had hated Henry Clay ever so badly, he would scorn to strike him through the Constitution of the United States. What! was Mr. Clay so invulnerable, that he was only to be got at by thrusting a dagger through the vitals of the Constitution; by trampling down all the long-settled and established opinions of his whole life? He would not pay any mortal man so high a compliment. If he could not floor him, without flooring the Constitution, he would let him alone. If he had time, he should like to enter somewhat into a discussion of the principles laid down by his colleague, [Mr. GARRETT DAVIS.] His colleague stated that Mr. Clay was the very incarnation of Whigery, or the impersonation of Whigery; and that he who was not with Mr. Clay was not and could not be a Whig.

Mr. GARRETT DAVIS. If my colleague will permit me, I will repeat what I said. It was, "that the man who sought to overthrow Henry Clay, was as much an opponent of the Whigery of the present day, as an opponent of General Washington would have been of the Whigery of 1776.

Mr. MARSHALL. Well, that was very much like it; but he would reserve to himself the discussion of that subject for a proper time and place; protesting, however, against what he might now say being construed as an expression, on his part, of hostility to, or an intention to oppose him, in case he should be the Whig candidate for the Presidency.

After some other observations, he said that he was speaking of the Secretary of State, the other day, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] interrupted him right in the midst of a sentence. He said his mind was full of that great man at that time, and he was speaking of what should be or must be his fate. His (the Secretary of State's) position was a most unnatural one—a most unnatural one. Daniel Webster united with Mr. Tyler upon a question of State assent to be incorporated in a Government bank, was one of the funniest things that ever he heard of. [Laughter.] It was an unnatural position, and he (Mr. Webster) could not remain there. He had before said, and he said again, that Daniel Webster was a great man. People had called him cold. He (Mr. M.) did not think he was cold.. Some men had said that he was like Mont Blanc amongst the mountains; and that, if there was light around his brow, it was light without heat. The honorable gentleman proceeded to defend Mr. Webster against such assertions, and also against the remark of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. G. DAVIS]—that he had no genius; but that his mind was like a crucible, into which men's thoughts were thrown; and that then he could reproduce them in a new form; and he compared the attempts which had been made to extinguish Mr. Webster, to an attempt of schoolboys to extinguish mighty Vesuvius with a squirt.

Mr. GARRETT DAVIS entered into some explanations, that the House might clearly understand what he meant when he said that Mr. Clay was an impersonation of the Whig party.

Mr. PENDLETON moved an adjournment; but withdrew it, to permit various executive communications to be presented to the House.

Several resolutions were also presented and agreed to; and then

The House adjourned.

Allison and others, of the southwestern part of Pennsylvania, praying that the bankrupt law may be so amended as to make it, morally and politically, more acceptable to them, or that it may be repealed; and a memorial from citizens of the northern part of Pennsylvania, in favor of its immediate repeal: which memorials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON,

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana,

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the satisfaction of the claim of Joseph Barrow, sen., of Indiana, sole heir of Pierre Barrow, who was entitled to 400 acres of land under the acts of Congress of 29th August, 1788, and 3d March, 1791; and, also, into the expediency of satisfying the claim of the said Joseph Barrow, sen., to a military right for land located on White river, joining the land of Abraham King Kendall, confirmed by the Governor prior to 1806.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, without amendment, House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Edwin Bartlett, late consul of the United States at Lima;" and

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Brent, deceased, late consul of the United States at Paris;" and

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for altering the time of holding the circuit court of the United States for the district of Connecticut; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House for the relief of Allen Rogers.

Also, on his motion, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Scott Campbell, a half-breed Sioux Indian; and it was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, reported back from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, House bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Pellicer.

Also, on his motion, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of House bill for the relief of Garret Vleit; and it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson, for damages sustained in the discharge of his official duty, came up in its regular order; but was postponed till to-morrow, at the suggestion of Mr. LINN, who believed that it would be still further discussed, and might interfere with the bill then pending as the unfinished business.

The bill for the relief of Wm. Russell and others, was read the second time, taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Twin, was taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills from the House, which had been reported adversely upon by the Committee on Commerce, were taken up as in committee of the whole; and, on the motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, indefinitely postponed, viz:

[This bill proposes to relieve those companies from the payment of duties on certain railroad iron, which was lost on its way from New York to the place of its destination; which iron would not have been dutiable, if it had been actually laid down on the roads within three years from the time at which it was imported.]

The amendments of the committee having been agreed to, the bill was then debated by Mr. KING in opposition to its passage, and by Mr. EVANS and Mr. WALKER in favor of its passage; and there being no further proposition to amend, it was reported to the Senate; and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The unfinished debate from yesterday, on the question of passing the Oregon bill, was resumed.

Mr. LINN addressed the Senate for two hours, in reply to the objections made against the bill.

With the exception of the two Senators from South Carolina, the Senators who had taken ground of opposition confined their objections to one provision of the bill—that providing a grant of lands to settlers.

One of the Senators from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] objected not only to that provision, but to other provisions, and in general to the expediency and policy of any action on the subject at present. The other Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] who spoke yesterday, took wider ground, and objected to the bill in every particular. If his views were well-founded, we never should have anything to do with the territory.

In answering the objections of the last Senator, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] he would meet all that had been made from every quarter.

It was, however, matter of gratification to him that so many Senators had concurred in the propriety, policy, and expediency of the general objects of the bill, and that their objections were confined to a single provision.

If he understood the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] correctly, he conceived that Senator imputed to him a violation of the maxims of sound policy, by precipitating this measure without due consideration. If the Senator would but look to the records of Congress for the last twenty years, he would find that such an imputation was groundless. A bill of similar nature, and with the same objects in view, was urged upon Congress with great ability by Dr. Floyd, in 1821. Mr. Monroe, in his last annual message, and Mr. Adams, while President of the United States, recommended, in forcible terms, the attention of Congress to be given to the subject. In 1828, Congress did take it up; and a bill for the occupation of the territory was discussed at great length in both Houses. It failed in the Senate by a bare majority of two votes. It had been repeatedly before Congress since, and almost continuously since 1838–'39. There was nothing precipitate in all this, and certainly no want of due consideration. For his own part, he had always acted with studied delicacy in the matter. When it was urged upon him that while so many difficulties were to be adjusted with Great Britain, it was inexpedient to take any decided step in relation to a minor point, he refrained from pressing the subject to a final vote. Now, the main difficulties with England were adjusted; and there were none left pending but the minor ones, of which he considered this the most important. So far, then, from being chargeable with having chosen an inauspicious and inexpedient time for urging this measure, he thought he had selected the most appropriate, and he would say, critically appropriate, period, for taking a necessary, and almost indispensable step.

He understood the Senator's objections to the bill to be three fold. First, he objects that the bill would, in its main provisions, be an infraction of the treaty of 1818, renewed in 1827; secondly, that, if carried out, it would involve our Government in the expenses of an armed military occupation of the territory; and, thirdly, that the territory is a useless acquisition, likely to prove, not only an incumbrance, but a disadvantageous one, by inciting our population to dispersion, instead of that concentration which he considers essential to the highest state of civilization.

Mr. L. here took these points in succession, and entered upon their refutation with elaborate arguments, fortified by documentary evidence.

First, he considered the arguments of the Senators who had taken ground that the bill would be an infraction of the treaty, and examined critically that branch of the subject, concluding with a reference to the proposition made to Mr. Gallatin, in 1826, by the British ministry, when they wanted an additional stipulation in the renewal of the treaty of 1818, for the right of joint occupancy; which Mr. Gallatin refused to concede, and upon the very ground that justified this bill; and showed it was not an infraction of the treaty, and that England had put it out of her power so to regard it, by the very application which she had made, and which she was refused by our negotiator. Mr. L., having disposed of this objection, proceeded to the next.

The second objection related to the expense or the proposed measure. In the outset, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] had made y mistake in supposing the appropriation required bf this bill would amount to $200,000. It only called for half that amount. This, in ten years, (if obliged to be continued so long,) would amount to but $1,000,000, instead of $10,000,000, as the Senator argued. But had not the Senator entirely overlooked the numerous losses which this country had suffered for the last thirty years, through its commerce and its industry, by being gradually supplanted in that region by British trading companies? At one time we had a trade, in furs alone, worth half a million of dollars annually; and, through the supineness of our Government, it had been allowed to dwindle down to $2,000. Did we not, then, incur incalculably greater loss by neglect, than the annual expenditure now proposed? In the next ten years, would not the increased advantages to our commerce in the Pacific, the facilities afforded by the security of our harbors in the territory to our marine service, and all the other advantages of insuring a thriving population on the border of the Pacific, be infinitely more than the sum of one million, even if the occupation by military posts costs so much? Now, with regard to distance, inconvenience, and expense, he asked Senators only to draw a parallel between this measure and that of the establishment of the African squadron, which was to place the recaptured negroes in the colony of Liberia. He showed that this squadron was the twelfth part of the navy of the United States—to wit, 80 guns out of 940; and that the whole cost of the navy for 1843 was about $7,000,000—the twelfth part of which was near $600,000; and this was the annual cost of the African squadron, while only $100,000 was proposed for the Columbia settlement. The African squadron was to be kept up five years, at near $600,000 per annum, besides loss of lives and ships on the African coast. This was near $3,000,000; yet no objection to that! Mr. L. commented on this strange preference given to an African over an American object, and insisted that, while millions could be lavished on the African squadron, no objection should be made to $100,000 for saving the Columbia from foreign dominion.

As to the third objection—that of the country being composed of rocky mountains, regions either covered with volcanic remains or arid sands, with only a small portion of arable land, and that subject to alternate droughts and inundations of rain—he (Mr. L.) should say that the Senator [Mr. McDUFFIE] who entertained these opinions must certainly be unacquainted with the vast amount of documentary evidence gained from eyewitnesses, whose testimony does not admit of a question of doubt, and all which concur in proving that, in the Oregon Territory, there are extensive valleys not inferior to our Western valleys in size, unrivalled in fertility, and blessed with a salubrity of climate scarcely equalled by that of any State in this Union. Mr. L. here read a vast accumulation of documentary evidence in proof of this position.

Having met all these arguments in detail, Mr. L. proceeded with general arguments in support of the policy and expediency of the bill; he demanded why the British wanted it, if it was so worthless; animadverted upon the inconsistency of treating the territory as not worth having, and, at the same time, dreading a war from Great Britain, if we touched it; and concluded with an exhortation to Senators, before they decided upon voting against it, to consider well the effect which a rejection of this essential step would have—not only disappointing and discouraging our own citizens, but giving countenance to the pretensions of, and leaving open and undisputed to, a rival power, every sort of encroachment upon our national rights.

The foregoing is given as a mere sketch of Mr. L.'s arguments in substance. His speech in full will convey them more correctly, and furnish all the documentary evidence referred to.

Mr. BERRIEN next obtained the floor; and, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

Mr. ATHERTON, under the rule, presented the memorial of John Haven and others, inhabitants of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, praying for such measures as shall give to the navigation of the United States such terms of just reciprocity as shall most conduce to the public welfare.

Mr. H. DODGE presented the memorial of David Irwin and others, asking Congress that an act may be passed confirming certain entries to lands; and that patents may be issued for the same, in accordance with the prayer of the memorial.

Mr. WELLER presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Preble county, Ohio, praying an appropriation to the Cumberland road, and remonstrating against any change whatever in the present location through that county: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. RODNEY presented the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Delaware, on the subject of the conflicting claims to the Peapatch Island in the Delaware, and calling on the Government to retrocede it to said State; pledging the faith of the Legislature to restore it to the United States when the title shall have been quieted by the Supreme Court: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy inform this House the amount of money paid to the officers of the scientific corps engaged in the exploring expedition, and to the navy officers engaged in the coast survey, since the 3d day of March, 1839; distinguishing between the amount paid them as their regular annual compensation, and moneys, paid them for extra or any services other than their regular compensation.

Mr. KEIM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, by the general consent of the House, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Homans; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. MEDILL presented a memorial from a company of gentlemen, citizens of Ohio, showing the fearful extension of British commerce, settlements, arms, and influence over the territories of the United States west of the Rocky Mountains, encouraged by the late movements of the Hudson Bay Company for the occupation of the Russian possessions and California, under the probable advice of the British Government, and the movements of that Government for the possession of the Musquito coast and the Sandwich Islands—alleging that their apprehensions for the early and peaceable establishment of our rights have been greatly increased by the late treaty with Great Britain, and the almost simultaneous breaking up of the American Fur Company. Great Britain having obtained thereby one hundred and twenty miles of valuable frontier southwest of the St. Francis river, which she agreed to relinquish by the arbitration of 1832; and all intercourse between the Americans and Indians having been cut off: expressing their doubts of the propriety of employing a sufficient military force to maintain possession of the country, under the present depressed condition of the treasury; and praying a grant of land to themselves and associates, not exceeding 20,000 square miles, under such regulations as Congress shall see proper to prescribe, on condition of their immediate removal, settlement upon, and defence of the same.

On motion by Mr. MEDILL, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRONSON presented the petition of sundry merchants, shipmasters, and others, of Augusta and Hallowell, Maine, praying for a revision of our navigation laws, so as to place our tonnage on an equal footing with that of foreign nations; which, on motion by Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the bill on that subject, heretofore reported by the Committee on Commerce, was made the special order of the day for the first Tuesday in February next.

Mr. COWEN, from the Committee of Claims, asked leave to make an adverse report on the case of General Joseph M. Hernandez. Mr. C. said that there was a minority report on this subject, and he moved that both reports be printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. TOMLINSON, from the minority of the same committee, said that the minority had reported, by bill, in favor of the claimant, and he moved to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER said that the minority could not report a bill.

Mr. COWEN suggested that the gentleman could get at his object by moving to refer the subject to the Committee of the Whole. The majority of the committee were desirous of bringing the whole subject before the House.

The SPEAKER suggested to the gentleman from Ohio, that, by reporting the bill of the minority, it would not make the majority of the committee responsible for it; and in this way the subject could be best brought before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COWEN acquiesced in that course; and the bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole; and the reports were ordered to be printed.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John Hodgkin; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making provision for the warehousing of imported goods, accompanied by a detailed report on the subject. The bill was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the report was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. KENNEDY, five thousand extra copies of the report were also ordered to be printed.

Mr. POPE presented a memorial on the subject of the improvement of the Western rivers; which,

On motion by Mr. STEENROD, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WISE presented four memorials from the northwestern part of New York, praying for the passage of the exchequer bill.

PLAN OF AN EXCHEQUER.

The House resumed, as the special order, the adverse report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of the exchequer—the question being on the motion of Mr. CUSHING to amend the resolution concluding that report, by striking out the word "not."

Mr. PENDLETON, who had the floor, observed, that some days since the gentleman from Massachusetts informed the House that, of the number of petitions presented on the subject of the exchequer, the one from the city of Cincinnati alone contained 5,000 signatures. He presumed that he had received all the petitions that came from his section of the country—some of which were in favor of the President's plan, and some in favor of the congressional plan. The advocates of the latter, however, in comparison with the former, were exceedingly few. The gentleman who brought these petitions to the city, and delivered them to him, informed him that they contained but 1,200 names. Be this as it might, among those names he recognised many of his personal friends of both political parties, whose wishes and opinions were entitled to receive from him the most respectful consideration. Shortly about to retire from public life, to renew his associations with these very petitioners, he might be permitted to say, without giving offence, that that association would be more agreeable to his tastes and habits than anything he could find here. He felt most anxious to think with them, and reconcile his vote in accordance with their feelings and wishes to the paramount duty which he owed to his country. Before he could give such vote, he found it necessary to examine the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. He approached that argument with every disposition to be able to draw a different conclusion from it. He had examined it with the utmost care, and he now frankly confessed that, with all the scrutiny he had been able to give it, with a predisposition against it, yet he could find no part of it with which he could conscientiously differ.

After some other observations, he turned to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and enumerated the plans of finance and currency in that document set forth, to which he added others; thus placing in opposition the sub-treasury, the United States bank, the Executive exchequer plan, the projet of the Select Committee, and the State bank system. Of the State bank system, he said, there were none now to contend for it; and yet it was a system which President Jackson, in his annual messages, said had been ascertained and proved to be the best and most valuable, and entirely successful. He read extracts from four of President Jackson's messages on the subject. But, after all, that system failed; and now no one was found its advocate. He then traced the history of the sub-treasury, of which some future committee would say there was none willing to be its friend: the people had denounced it by larger majorities than they have ever before rejected any public measure; and that being disposed of, he would look at the Executive's plan of an exchequer, and compare it with the condemned sub-treasury. The sub-treasury provided simply a fiscal agent for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue; the exchequer proposed to do the same thing, and substantially in the same way. But, in addition to this, the exchequer proposed to furnish and secure a national currency. They had been told that there was too much bank capital in the country; but he contended that capital was wanted to develope their resources and carry their produce to market. He illustrated, at some length, the mode of doing business with bills of exchange.

He then went into a comparison of the sub-treasury and the exchequer. The one provided that all the dues of the Government should be paid in specie. The other provided that they should be paid, first, in specie; second, in certificates of deposite; third, in treasury notes; and, fourth, in the notes of specie-paying banks. Now, what was the difference between the two? In the matter of specie payment, they were the same. The second mode of payment, according to the exchequer, was by certificates of deposite, representing bullion or gold and silver. This was, in fact, the same thing as paying in specie. But certificates of debt were to be given to the public creditors; and these were to be received in payment of public dues. This, then, was but a substitute for coin. He moreover opposed the principle of giving certificates to creditors of the Government, as a measure only resorted to by spendthrift governments. The third mode of payment was in treasury notes; but did the exchequer bill provide for an issue of treasury notes? Certainly not; although it made them receivable. The fourth mode was in the notes of specie-paying banks. This would do no good, because it would compel the specie to be locked up in the vaults of the banks. Hence he argued that the scheme would not tend to increase the currency of the country, and was but a complex piece of machinery. He also argued against the provision by which certificates of deposite were to be given to those who might deposite specie at any point. Such deposites, he contended, would, whenever they were of any advantage, cost more than it would to transport specie from place to place.

In relation to the provision requiring the assent of the States to the establishment of branches within their several limits, he urged that the question of the currency entered into the elections all over the country; and the consequence would be, that branches would be permitted in the States, according as this or that party obtained the ascendency. He agreed with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that we should not depend upon State legislation in determining upon a plan of finance. In mere matters of expediency, he would be as willing to yield as any man; but he could not, on a question like this, surrender any great power vested in Congress by the Federal Constitution.

After urging, as a further objection to the bill, that it would furnish two kinds of currency—gold and silver, and a national paper currency—Mr. P. was cut off by the expiration of his hour.

Mr. WISE next obtained the floor, and said that he should not now speak, but for his limit of time, in which he could not compress what he had to say on the subject. He should, however, avail himself of the opportunity, to throw off some of the preliminary matter, before the House should resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, when he should again speak. If the question had to be decided to-day, (as had been intimated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means,) he wished, before sundown, to reply to all that there was of argument in the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, yesterday. That gentleman had devoted his time, on three several occasions when he had addressed the House, to the Secretary of State, and the views of that functionary upon matters of finance. As this regular set-to on the Secretary of State involved important principles, he should endeavor to discuss those parts of the gentleman's speech in which he had sought to convict the Secretary (whom he called his master) of inconsistency. The gentleman seemed to think that the Secretary of State had, for the first time, advanced a great principle, on which he (Mr. M.) had dwelt in his speech. He would say to the gentleman, that Mr. Webster had not advanced the principle for the first time—not the first by a hundred; for it was first advanced by Alexander Hamilton, and afterwards by the gentleman's own illustrious uncle—John Marshall. This great principle was discussed in the first meeting of the cabinet of General Washington; and the issue was made between Jefferson and Hamilton, whether the Federal Government was sovereign to the full extent of its Federal powers; whether, if the Federal Government possessed a power, it possessed it independently and separately. It was then contended that State assent could not give a power which before was not possessed; as a State dissent could not take away a power which was possessed. It was then not only conceded by Jefferson, but admitted by all, (for the question was whether the power had been granted or not,) that whatever power was granted and did exist, was paramount and all-pervading. This was conceded. If, then, the power of incorporation had been given, it was held that such power was co-extensive with the limits of the Union, and bounded only by its jurisdiction and territory. Thus, then, it became an axiom, that, as the State assent could not give, so, also, the State dissent could not take away, a power, except by an amendment of the Constitution, made in the prescribed form.

The gentleman from Kentucky having taken pains to insist three several times that the Secretary of State first advanced this ground—that the power of incorporation would extend over the Union—and then, assuming that a Government bank was the worst of all institutions, having gone on to prove that the exchequer was a Government bank, he (Mr. W.) proposed to discuss that question. Is the exchequer a Government bank?

In the first place, it was not a definite idea to talk of the exchequer, because, as his friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had said, the idea was capable of various modifications. There were two plans before the House—the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the plan of the Select Committee; one containing the provision which required State assent, whilst the other did not. There was a third plan—that of the Senate. Thus, then, the exchequer was subject to as many modifications as a national bank or a sub-treasury. When he spoke of an exchequer, he spoke of the idea as embodied in the resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON,] which was, in the first place, that it should be without any act of incorporation; second, that it should separate the Government from individuals—public funds from private; and especially that there should be an exercise of the constitutional custody and control of Congress over the public money, independent of the Executive; not stripping the Executive of any power given by the Constitution, but defining, limiting, regulating, controlling, and directing it. This was his idea of the exchequer, and the gentleman from Kentucky insisted that it was a Government bank.

He (Mr. W.) would discuss this question. In the first place, he would say, that the gentleman had taken great pains to reply to an article in the Madisonian, in which the word precise had occurred several times. He thought the gentleman had taken care not to be very precise himself. He wished to show that the gentleman's definition of a Government bank would not bear the test of examination. When the gentleman said that the nature, and not the name, constituted an institution, he was very true.

The gentleman said, first, that it was a moneyed institution; second, that it dealt in money for profit. Mark the second proposition—that it dealt in money for profit. He wished that the gentleman was in his seat, that he might ask him who he presumed concurred in this report of the Committee of Ways and Means? What was the very power of the Government, which was now in question before the House and the country? He would take the power as it was defined by the Committee of Ways and Means. "The country," said the Committee of Ways and Means, "has been agitated for many years on the all-absorbing questions of finance and currency. The power of finance involves the inquiry into the best mode of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public revenue"—that is, the public money—"and that of the currency into the best mode of creating a circulating medium"—that is, the circulating money of the country. That, said Mr. W. is a definition in which I concur.

The very power of the Government which was now in question, was the power of finance, which first involved the subject of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public money; and the other power involved in this question, was the power of currency, which included the power of regulating and controlling money for Government purposes. Then, if this power of the Government was exercised at all, it must be in the form of some institution of law, which, first, was a moneyed institution, and, secondly, dealt in money for profit. He wished to be distinctly understood in this argument—from which he defied the gentleman to escape—that, whether it be an institution of law by act of corporation, or by organization, such as the Bank of the United States, and the Treasury Department—if it exercised the above powers, it must be an institution of law, in whatever form created, which is a moneyed institution dealing in money for profit.

The present treasury system was a bank under that definition.

The act of 1789, which organized the Treasury Department, and made the Treasurer of the United States the keeper of the public moneys—which created the receivers and disbursing agents officers of the Government—was an institution of law, not by act of incorporation, but by organization. There was a moneyed institution; and, secondly, it was an institution which dealt in money for the sake of profit. Was it not notorious that, under every administration of the Government, from General Washington's to this day, under every Secretary of the Treasury, and in every month and week, the Government had bought and sold bills of exchange for the transfer of the public money, and as often getting a premium as paying it? Moreover, the Secretary of State, for paying foreign ambassadors, and the Secretary of the Navy, for paying the officers of the navy abroad on foreign service, had to buy bills of exchange. Mr. Woodbury himself, the great advocate of the independent treasury, had done it. But this was a very minute view of the scope of profit and loss in which the Treasury had been engaged. He begged leave to call the gentleman's attention to a much broader system of profit and loss, in which the Treasury dealt under the act of 1789. Why, the whole book of profit and loss was before them in the case before the House. How should the public money be best collected and kept? Why, there was profit in the idea of preventing loss. How should the Government collect its dues in the most valuable funds? There was positively the idea of gain. How should it be kept in the safest manner? How disburse it in the most profitable way? Why, in disbursing, the Government would avail itself of that system which paid no discount, but made a profit. Not only the act of 1789, but the Treasury itself, according to that definition, was a bank—a moneyed institution, dealing in money for profit. The collectors, receivers, and especially one body of officers created at the last session of Congress, constituted a bank, if this idea was correct. To show how utterly fallacious was this definition of a bank, he would ask what the gentleman would make of the commissioner of loans sent to obtain a loan at a premium if he could get it, or at the lowest discount? Did not the gentleman see that this definition of a bank would not bear the test? He defied the gentleman to create or define, in fancy or in fact, an institution which should have the power of finance and the power of the currency—the power of disbursing and the power of creating a currency—without having the nature of a bank. This was reducing the gentleman's argument at once to the argumentum ad absurdum. What, then, was the distinction?

The gentleman had very truly said that a bank might be incorporated, or not; one of deposite or of issue, or not; of loan and discount, or not; that it might be a sole, or joint, &c., &c. Now he would ask the gentleman if every private individual was a banker, who, merely for the ordinary transactions of life, borrowed money, or lent money, or who took a discount, or shaved or exacted a premium when he sold a bill of exchange? Certainly not; and yet the same individual who did all these things, neither more nor less, under a different aspect, without an act of incorporation, or with it, was called a banker; and why? Because the name of banker depended not only upon the nature of his business, but upon his profession; and if he (Mr. W.) had time, he could produce an abundance of authorities to prove the truth of the position. I may (said Mr. W.) lend my friend from Indiana a thousand dollars, and may sell him a bill of exchange, and I may not be a banker. Though I may issue to him a bill of credit; though I may discount his note; though I may exact a premium from him; and even though I may perform one of the modern functions of a bank—defraud him,—yet all that will not constitute me a banker. But in a land where unlicensed banking is tolerated—as it was in Virginia, till it was suppressed and punished by law—if I set up my sign as a banker and broker, profess to deal in the business of banking, discount, and deposits—to deal in money for profit; then not only the nature of my business, but my profession constitutes me a banker. As long as I am a private individual, not held to the common law usages, which are binding on bankers and nobody else—as long as I do not profess myself to be a banker, all the courts of justice in the world will not treat me as such; will not exact the common customs of a bank, (the three days of grace, for example,) and will not allow me the privileges of one. So it was (Mr. W. went on to say) with the Government. The Government had to deal with all—the poorest, as well as the richest. It was no banker; but still, as a private individual must do, it had to collect money to pay its debts, to keep money, and disburse money. So long as it was exercising the powers vested in it by the Constitution over the finances and the currency, it was no bank; but the moment it stepped beyond the power of the Constitution—beyond the power of the currency, the power to lay and collect taxes, the power to create a circulating medium in such form that the collections and disbursements of the Government might be safely made,—the moment it transcended that power, collaterally or directly, incidentally or positively, and performed the business of discount and exchange, dealing in money for the sake of profit alone,—then, and not till then, it was a bank. The proposition, then, with which he met the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, was, that the mere custody and control of the public money would not constitute a bank. If it did, then the gentleman could not escape. Would he maintain the proposition that they were obliged to create a joint-stock company, or obliged to create a bank? One or the other: let the gentleman take that position. Yes, let him take that position, that there must either be an incorporation of private individuals, which would not be a Government bank, or an institution of the Government; and what did he arrive at then? And what was the difference between a Government bank and a national bank, in common parlance? A Government bank was for the purpose of the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money for public purposes, and to regulate the circulating medium, so as to make taxes uniform, and both the people and the Government safe. And what was the difference between such a bank and a national bank? The first difference was a constitutional difference. The next was, that the Government bank was for Government purposes alone; but a national bank was not only for national purposes, but for individual profit. A national bank was not necessarily connected with the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys; nor was it necessarily connected with the circulating medium. But further—and this was an important difference, to which he wished to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and those gentlemen who objected to the assent and dissent principle—the national bank project would delegate the great power over the finances and the currency to a company consisting of a president and nine directors. If, then, they created a national bank, they yielded the sovereign power and the control of the institution, which would wield the great government power over the currency and the finances to a board of directors, which stood as 6 to 3 against the Government. It was not left to the courtesy of the States to assent to the exchequer or not, for six directors would possess sovereign power—six directors of individual stockholders. What became, then, of the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky? [Mr. MARSHALL] But when the exchequer was established, or the odious and denounced sub treasury was restored, all would admit that it was a Government power—that it was the power of the Constitution exercised according to the legislative will. If, however, gentlemen would object to the principle of assent and dissent on the part of the States, they ought by all means to object to the creation of a national bank; for the reason that it would give to six individuals, and not to sovereign States, that were a part of the federal compact, the great power of assent or dissent. And it was not only a one-third power, but there was a perpetuity of power, unrepealable for the duration of the charter of the national bank. That was a fourth difference between a Government bank and a national bank. A Government bank was always under the command of the Government, and subject to the will of the people; but a national bank embraced in its first idea an act of incorporation, which contained in it the sound doctrine of vested rights, which made it intact for the time of its creation, however objectionable it might be.

He next proceeded to defend the Secretary of State, who (he said) did not, for the first time, at Faneuil Hall, avow his renunciation of a bank of the United States. He was understood to assume that Mr. Webster made such a declaration in the Senate of the United States in 1836 What, then, was the issue between the Secretary of State and the gentleman from Kentucky—the great master and the great pupil? The issue was this: If they could not create an incorporation of vested rights, delegating to a two-thirds directory the power over the finances and the currency, should they abandon the power and the custody entirely, and leave the public moneys unguarded, as at present? That was what was proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in his report, which would leave everything to executive discretion and executive power. And the gentleman from Kentucky would have no Government bank, for he would rather have the present system, which, according to his argument, was itself a Government bank; so that he was in a position that was a little more unnatural than the one in which he said the Secretary of State was placed.

The honorable gentleman continued to comment on the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] until the expiration of his hour brought him to a conclusion.

Mr. ATHERTON next addressed the House. He deemed it proper that he should reply to some of the positions in the report of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, from which he dissented; although, so far as their resolution was concerned, it had his decided approval. It appeared, from the general course of the debate, that the majority of the Whig party objected to a Government bank, whilst the other portion objected to a United States bank. The whole tenor of the report of the committee indicated a preference for the independent treasury over any other system, except a bank of the United States. From the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he should infer that that gentleman preferred the independent treasury to any system, except a Government bank. Now, he thought these several divisions of the Whig party were correct in their objections—one to a Government bank, and the other to a United States bank.

Mr. WISE wished to know if the gentleman understood him (Mr. W.) as having advocated a Government bank.

Mr. ATHERTON said he did understand the gentleman as having advocated what he (Mr. A.) considered a Government bank.

These objections to a Government bank, which were urged by a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, would, he was of the opinion, apply with equal force to a United States bank. What were they? He referred to the 12th page of the committee's report, where the objection was raised that it would give an undue control over the State banks. The report said: "It is true that, by the exchequer plan, the bills of specie-paying banks are receivable for public dues; but it must be borne in mind, that it is made the imperative duty of the agent receiving them to settle with the banks weekly; and this settlement can have no other object than to draw out the amount in specie. * * * * But, by the exchequer plan, large additions are invited for deposites and drafts sold; and all received for public dues and drafts sold goes into the hands of the exchequer agent, who has the power to favor a petted institution, by paying out its bills during the week, and to crush an obnoxious one, by demanding the specie on all its bills. This may be a most dangerous political power, which may be brought to bear with tremendous effect upon the various banks throughout the country, and is, in this respect, far more dangerous than the sub-treasury." Now, he asked, how would this danger be lessened by confiding these powers to the hands of an irresponsible money corporation? Would any of the evils be taken away, by placing those powers in the hands of a corporation governed by men whose object would be to subserve their own exclusive interest—men not selected by, and responsible to, the people—and who have no ambition to perform their trusts faithfully? He thought that it must be admitted the power thus spoken of by the committee would be equally dangerous in the hand of a moneyed corporation.

Again: on the 10th page of the report the committee said: "We have deplorable evidences of this, in the numerous defaulters to the Government, and the scarcely less numerous instances of bank officers, acting under the immediate eye of those interested, who have embezzled the funds which they were paid to guard." Here was an admission that bank officers were not to be trusted! Did not, he would ask, the fact apply with equal force to the officers of a bank created with Government? In the same page (10) the committee further said: "All these facts lead to but one conclusion, and that seems irresistible: which is, that the Government ought not to engage in banking, but that that should be left to private corporations or companies, which may be effectually restrained in their issues by penal laws, for the violation of which they may be made amenable to the courts. Certainly nothing short of this can prevent excessive issues, or insure prompt redemption; and even this has not always effected that object. Mr. Ricardo, an eminent writer on this subject, says: 'Experience, however, shows that neither a State nor a bank ever has had the unrestricted power of issuing paper money, without abusing that power. In all States, therefore, the issue of paper money ought to be under some check or control.' As you cannot check or control Congress on this subject, it would follow that we ought not to attempt to exercise this power." Now, what he would remark was, that this power was as liable to abuse in the hands of a corporation, as by the Government itself. It was, in fact, the interest of individuals owning corporations which ever prompted to over-issues.

In speaking of defalcations by officers and agents, the committee said: "This is the hazard with an honest agent. But suppose the exchequer agent dishonest. Suppose him a warm political partisan: might not these favors be dealt out to political friends, and denied to political enemies? Or suppose money is wanted to corrupt the fountains of the elective power, or carry some great political contest:—how easy would it be for a dishonest and pliant exchequer agent to buy the drafts of some irresponsible political friend, and thus pour out the national treasury for the basest of purposes!"

He asked, were the dangers here spoken of likely to be lessened by confiding the public money to an immense corporation? Did not the history of the late United States Bank show that the public money was constantly used for the furtherance of political purposes? Surely, if such an objection as has been here urged by the committee applied to the exchequer, it applied with much greater force to an irresponsible corporation. It had been well remarked by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WINTHROP,] who addressed the House on yesterday, that distrust was the prevailing sentiment of this report. It must be considered that this was a Government of limited powers, and the theory of which was to trust its agents with no more power than was absolutely necessary. It was essentially a Government of limited powers, and the people had reserved to themselves all which were not absolutely necessary to carry it on. What had the House heard from the gentleman from New York? [Mr. BARNARD.] Why, that there was a competency in the Constitution for the adoption of the exchequer, so far as it related to the safekeeping and disbursement of the public money, but not so as regards its provisions for depositing and for the regulation of commercial exchanges. There was also, according to the gentleman, a competency for the adoption of the sub-treasury. Now, if it was not competent for the Government to deal in exchanges—if the Constitution gave no such power, how could such a power be delegated to a corporation? Congress could not delegate what it did not possess. Therefore, the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] overthrew all argument which might be derived from the Constitution in favor of the power to establish a bank of the United States.

But it was formerly urged as a great objection to the subt-reasury, that it failed to exercise the power granted to Congress—of regulating the currency. What was a legal currency? Gold and silver were recognised by the Constitution as the legal currency of the country; and the resolution of 1816 also recognised it as such; although, at the same time, it provided that the notes of the United States Bank should be a legal tender. If Congress was bound to provide a currency, of course they must provide one which is legal; and nothing but gold and silver was recognised in the Constitution as such. The surest way of regulating exchanges, (if anything could be done incidentally by the Government for that purpose,) was by enacting a law providing for the entire collection and disbursement of the public revenues in gold and silver. But even if there were a power in the Government to regulate exchanges, its interference would, he imagined, be attended only with mischief. The Government, properly, had nothing to do with such matters. Exchanges should be regulated by the course of trade; and it would be as reasonable to contend that the Government should regulate the price or the freight of merchandise. Gentlemen had spoken of the watchful eye of self-interest to regulate the banks: why not leave exchanges to be regulated by it also? When gold and silver are the currency, the rate of exchange can never exceed the price of transportation. If a bank on one side of the street redeems its notes, whilst another on the opposite side does not, the difference between the notes of the two is as much the rate of exchange as if the two banks were in different sections of the country. Why should the Government any more undertake to regulate the price of exchange than the price of provisions? He illustrated this position by several examples, and concluded that any interference by the Government in such a matter would be vain and idle—would defeat its own ends—and, so far from being beneficial, would be disadvantageous, to commerce.

The Constitution, as he had said, fixed the standard of value—gold and silver only. All acknowledged it was desirable that more gold and silver should circulate in the community. [Mr. BARNARD shook his head.] As the gentleman had shaken his head, he would read a few extracts from what was said by a man who, he presumed, was very good authority with the gentleman. He read from the message of Governor John Davis to the Legislature of Massachusetts in 1834.

"There is doubtless a difference of opinion as to the causes which produce the great vacillations in the money market. At one time, the premium on capital falls below the legal rate of interest; at another, money can scarcely be had on any terms. There can, however, be little doubt that the small quantity of specie in circulation is one of the causes tending to produce these disastrous fluctuations. If a panic should seize the public, if distrust should overshadow our banks but for a day, all payments in specie would cease; for the funds on hand do not amount to one-twelfth of the bills in circulation, and those deposites they are bound to pay on demand. This disproportion between specie and paper cannot be materially increased. If the quantity of specie is diminished, the paper circulation must be curtailed. If it is increased, the paper may also be increased. The paper, therefore, fluctuates as its basis changes."

"The disastrous fluctuations which we experience (he adds in 1834) are to some extent to be imputed to the fluctuations in specie, (meaning in amount, not in value;) and the smaller the amount of specie in the country, the more likely they are to occur. The most obvious remedy, therefore, against the recurrence of this calamity, and the most certain method of saving the active industry of the country from the devouring vortex of this almost periodical disaster, which comes of curtailing discounts, is to increase, by some judicious regulations, the quantity of specie in circulation to such an extent that these occasional drains shall not curtail the circulating medium so as to produce such consequences. If the circulation of small bills had never been permitted, but their places had been supplied with specie, the quantity now in circulation would be large, and would greatly strengthen the confidence of the public and the ability of the banks, as it would flow in to supply the place of that drained off, and thus supersede, to a great extent, the occasion for these forced curtailments of discounts which always prove injurious to the public. The States which have adopted this course, are best supplied with specie; and if the whole country could be prevailed on to suppress small bills, great relief would be realized from it."

"Experience has long since proved that a metallic currency is least liable to fluctuations, and therefore best adapted to the purpose for which it is designed; and it is to be hoped the earliest opportunity will be seized to return to it—so far, at least, as to rectify the present credit system of paper currency, and prevent its pernicious fluctuations."

"Fluctuations visit all who have property, and all who work to acquire it, with injury, and compel them to submit to severe sacrifices. What is called a scarcity of money, only means that the banks do not discount."

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had well mentioned, among the inherent evils of paper money, its expansibility, which brought periodical ruin, disaster, and distress. Should the Government, then, increase and promote this evil, by issuing Government paper by a Government bank, or indirectly through the agency of a United States bank? Was it possible to remedy the evil of expansion, by increasing the amount of the paper volume? Would not such a course be only adding fuel to the flame? And if it was proposed by a bank of the United States to regulate the issues of other banks, history proved that such a purpose could not be so accomplished. History and experience showed that the banks nearest and most under the influence of the United States Bank, were the first to suspend; whilst those remotely situated from that institution held out longest, and were the last to cease paying specie. If it was expected to check these overissues of banks by law, such an idea could not be carried out, because it went counter to all experience of the past. What had been the history of the banking system? Did not observation tell us that banks could not be restricted by law? The zeal, and influence, and the untiring energy of interested individuals, were entirely too strong for the law. They had heretofore set all law at defiance. They had applied to State Legislatures to give them authority to suspend specie payments, and then called it giving relief to the community—giving relief by issuing more of their irredeemable paper!

And as to the watchful eyes of self-interest, which, it was said, were so important in the prevention of the abuses of banking, had they not been shown to be utterly unavailing? Had it not been shown to be powerless, in all that they had heard of the suspensions and frauds committed on the stockholders and the public? And what had availed the power of the Legislatures of the States? It had proved to be utterly useless, as was lately found to be the case with regard to a bank in Massachusetts. The Legislature of that State passed a law to provide for inspections of the banks of that State; and the law had proved to be so perfectly useless, that the present Governor, in his message, recommended its repeal.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in the remarks which he had made to the House, had not asserted that the result of the late presidential election had been an affirmative decision upon the question as to the propriety of establishing a bank of the United States. He would ask the gentleman whether, in the result of that election, the people had manifested their approbation of the exchequer plan. And he would ask whether, if the question were now put to the people of this country whether they would have a bank of the United States or an independent treasury, he believed that they would decide in favor of a bank. No, sir; he would not say so. What did they hear from the gentleman from Vermont? That the objection urged against this scheme was, that it was a Government bank. This being the case, the issue was now given up. It was given up in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. If it had been rendered unpopular on account of a mistake as to its true character, arising from false imputations which had been cast upon it, what did the result prove? Not that the people condemned the independent-treasury scheme, but that they condemned the scheme of a Government bank. To show that he had not misstated the report, he would read the following passage:

"These banking powers, thus conferred upon the exchequer, for the purpose of furnishing a paper circulation, distinguish this plan from that of the sub-treasury."

They were under the apprehension that, when once established, this would be converted into a great Government bank. But, that there was no reason for even this apprehension, was evident from various passages in the report. The report acknowledged that the independent-treasury plan made it felony, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for an officer of that institution to use any of the public moneys intrusted to its keeping. They had, therefore, what had been urged as the main objection to it, at once given up. The objections fell to the ground; they vanished into air—into thin air. It had been frequently said, on that floor, that it was very difficult to tell what precise issue was determined by the late presidential election. At any rate, he would contend, with great confidence, that, whenever the sub-treasury scheme was presented as a distinct issue to the people, they approved it. But it was said, by a distinguished Whig, on this floor, that the election of members to the popular branch of this Congress turned upon their being for or against this scheme.

The gentleman from New York had gone over one of the old arguments against the independent-treasury scheme; but, in doing that, he had admitted (and he thought the admission did great credit to his candor) that the only objection to the scheme was, that it provided, after the money was deposited, that it was under the control of officers of the Government, and not officers of the bank. And he understood the gentleman to say that, since the foundation of the Government, except during an interval of one year, the moneys of the Government had always been deposited in banks. This was during the year in which the independent treasury was in operation.

An allusion was made in the report—in order to show that the danger was in intrusting the public moneys in the hands of individuals—to the case of Mr. Swartwout. But this, he apprehended, was not a case which bore any analogy to that which they were considering. Had the independent, treasury scheme been in operation, Mr. Swartwout never could have carried on his frauds and depredations upon the Government. This, then, furnished no argument against the establishment of an independent treasury.

It was stated in the report, and had been repeated in the House, that a bank cannot abscond. To be sure, it could not. It had not substance enough. It was a thing altogether as impalpable as a shadow.

"Like shadows they come, like shadows depart."

But could not cashiers—could not presidents abscond? Did the history of the times show that they were pure? He thought not. Why should banks come in and demand the use of the public moneys between the time of collection and of disbursement? What right had they to speculate with the money of the Government? If the right was not to be granted to individuals, why should it be granted to corporations? It appeared from documents before them, that the loss had not been one-half so great under the operation of the sub-treasury scheme, as it had been by using banks as depositeries, and receiving depreciated bank paper.

Mr. McDuffie, in a report which he made a few years ago to the House of Representatives on this subject, stated that the Government had lost upwards of thirty millions of dollars by taking depreciated bank paper. What was the effect upon the country generally of the encouragement thus given to the circulation of bank paper? The very stimulus given to trade by its means tends to create loans; and these loans go on extending, until at last, the bubble bursts; and, as had been well said by a gentleman on that floor, it was upon the hard hand and the unsuspecting head of the poor laborer that the rain falls. It was a well-settled rule, that the price of labor was the last to rise, and the first to fall. This appeared not only from the maxims of political economists, but from universal history. He begged leave to read an extract from Thiers's History of the French Revolution:

"The value of the assignats declining daily in proportion to their total mass, it required a larger and larger amount to purchase the same quantity of necessaries; and thus the prices became excessive. The people, receiving only the same nominal value for their labor, could no longer procure such things as they needed, and vented themselves in complaints and threats. Bread was not the only article the price of which was enormously increased; that of sugar, coffee, and soap was doubled. The laundresses had come to the convention to complain that they were obliged to pay thirty sous for soap, which had formerly cost them but fourteen. To no purpose were the people told to raise the price of their labor, in order to re-establish the proportion between their wages and the articles of consumption. They could not be brought to act in concert for the accomplishment of this object," &c.—Thiers's Hist. Fr. Rev., vol, 4, p. 441.

This single instance exhibited its operation in all cases. There could be no combination among laborers to raise the price of labor according to the depreciation in the currency.

On the 7th page of the report it was stated that, "by the sub-treasury, the Government only risked, in the hands of its officers, the amount of money that might be on hand between the time of collection and the time of disbursement." This was true, under all systems. They were obliged to employ collecting officers and disbursing officers, and they had the honesty of those officers to assure them against loss. And he would here observe, that it seemed to him the argument that corporations could be trusted, and men could not, was a very unsound argument. According to this supposition, there must be certainly something very corrupting in the circumstance of holding office—something which tends to obliterate the moral feelings. Gentlemen talked about the safety of the public moneys when deposited in banks, and that they would be found faithful to their trusts. Why, the Government was left powerless; the money was placed in the hands of those who were responsible to the people, and the Government was left prostrate.

Mr. PROFFIT obtained the floor, and replied briefly to some of the observations of the gentleman from New Hampshire. The gentleman had alluded to a report made some years ago by Mr. McDuffie, which stated that the Government had lost thirty millions of dollars by depositing the public funds in banks. What effect had this statement upon the gentleman himself, and upon his party? Did the gentleman suppose that he was to be permitted to make use of such arguments; or that they would be allowed to pass without reply? Did the gentleman mean to come out and avow himself in favor of an independent, old-fashioned treasury? Would his party agree to this? They would not do it; they dared not do it. Why did not the gentleman tell them something about the working of that old-fashioned sub-treasury? During the whole time it was in operation in New York, was there a single dollar in specie out? It was the duty of the friends of the Administration to defend themselves from such attacks as the gentleman had just made. How many millions of treasury notes did the gentleman himself vote for, although he was now so vehement in his denunciations against the issue of a paper currency by the Government? Let him answer this; and let him show, too, that the old-fashioned independent treasury scheme, which he vaunted so much, was free from abuses.

Mr. FILLMORE rose and said he desired to address a few words to the House, in reference to this matter.

An adjournment, however, being desired by several members, he yielded to a motion for that purpose, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 27, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting printed copies of the Official Army Register for 1843; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PORTER presented two memorials from Ypsilanti and Jackson, Michigan, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which were refered to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CLAYTON presented joint-resolutions, adopted by the Legislature of Delaware, urging upon Congress the retrocession from the United States, to the State of Delaware, of the Peapatch Island.

Mr. CLAYTON observed that the object of the retrocession was not that Delaware might retain possession of the island; but that the title, which had been so long litigated, might be settled, and vested permanently in the United States. For this purpose it was necessary that the Supreme Court should have original jurisdiction over the suit or controversy on which the title shall be tried;—the party claiming against the United States not having assented to the proposition of Congress to try the title in the State of Maryland. For the purpose of giving the Supreme Court original jurisdiction of this controversy or suit, and to obtain a proper and conclusive decision of the title, it was necessary to recede the island to the State of Delaware. Mr. C. said the people of Delaware could not rest satisfied with the present state of things—the conflicting claims for jurisdiction over the soil, and the conflicting right of property. He observed that neither himself nor his colleague would at that time take measures to carry into effect these resolutions, for the reason that an arrangement had been entered into, by which the title would be effectually and fairly adjusted; and to carry which into effect, a bill has been reported from the Judiciary Committee. It would not be necessary, therefore, for his colleague and himself to take any steps then in the matter, but await the decision of the Senate on the bill, by which the controversy would be fairly arranged to the satisfaction of all parties. If the bill did not pass, then they would take some steps in accordance with the resolutions just presented. The resolutions were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked that this would be joyful news to some of his constituency—that the States of Delaware and New Jersey were about to settle this long litigated question. For years and years the citizens of Philadelphia had felt great anxiety that the fortification which had been commenced on that island should be completed; and which could not be done, on account of the disagreements between those two States.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of a number of citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania, asking for an immediate, entire, and unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition from Patrick Keon, of Jefferson county, New York, praying for a modification in his behalf of the naturalization laws of the United States; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Also, a memorial from a number of citizens of the town of Oswego, New York, praying that they may be allowed to import from Canada certain lumber, free of duty: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a petition numerously signed by citizens of Troy, New York, praying for a repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Also, a petition from a large number of inhabitants of the county of Lenawee, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WOODBURY presented a memorial from the town of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, from persons engaged in commerce and navigation, complaining of the depressed state of those interests, and attributing it to the irreciprocal commercial regulations of the United States with foreign powers, and praying for such a modification of those regulations, consistent with treaty stipulations, as will produce greater reciprocity in trade: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STURGEON presented two memorials from inhabitants of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of the plan recommended by the Executive, for a board of exchequer; which were laid on the table.

Also, presented a memorial from the board of trade of Philadelphia, signed by Thomas P. Cope, president, asking for an appropriation for the purpose of completing the coast survey, which has been in a state of progress for several years; and stating a number of reasons why it should be continued. Also, concludes with a request that an appropriation be made for a light-house on the Brandywine shoals, in the Delaware. The first branch of the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance, and the latter to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pension made an adverse report (which was ordered to be printed) on the petition of James Gee for a pension.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, with an amendment, the House bill for the relief of Esther Augur.

Also, reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House for the relief of Benjamin Truston.

Also, from the same committee reported a bill for the relief of Nancy Polereesky, which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. KERR, the bill from the House for the relief of Elizabeth Dawkins, which had been reported unfavorably upon by the Committeee on Pensions, was recommitted to that Committee—new evidence in support of the claim having been received.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the previous orders of the day were postponed for the purpose of considering the bill from the House for the relief of Barent Stryker. The bill was then taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and, according to order, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. LINN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Henry M. Shreeve, and to authorize the purchase of the patent for his snag-boat: which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The bill to prevent the employment of private expresses on the mail routes, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenue of the Post Office Department, was read the second time, and taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. MERRICK said this was one of a series of bills to be reported to the Senate from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with the view of correcting sundry abuses which exist, and of sundry frauds which are practised upon the Post Office Department. The object of the present bill was to make some beneficial and salutary provisions in relation to a matter that was of very considerable importance to that department—namely, the securing to it of the legitimate revenue derivable from the transportation of the mail from one portion of the Union to the other.

It was well known to the Senate, that a very large portion of the proper revenue of that department was abstracted from it by what were called private expresses, which had been recently established between the more important commercial cities, and by which letters and other mailable matter were conveyed at a rate of charge less than that which was demanded by the Post Office Department; and, by charging less, although the mails were conveyed daily, and, in many places, twice every day, at the expense of the Government, they were obtaining the transportation of a very large proportion of the mailable matter passing through these routes, and consequently abstracting from the department a very considerable part of its legitimate revenue. As the Post Office Department had been established, and was kept up at the expense of the Government, for the performance of this service to the public, it was not only proper, but absolutely necessary that it should have a monopoly of the service, and enjoy all the benefits to be derived from it. The passage of this bill was contemplated by the committee as a preparatory step to the passage of another important bill for the reduction of the rates of postage. Unless objections were offered to some of the features of this bill, he did not deem it necessary to trouble the Senate with any further observations.

Mr. HENDERSON said he thought the provisions of the bill were carried to an unwarrantable extent. Congress probably possessed the constitutional power to pass a law of this kind; but it appeared to him it would be a bad precedent, and one which would lead to the stretching of the powers of Congress to every subject. The object of the bill appeared to be to secure to the Government a monopoly in the carrying of the mails.

So far as the bill proposed to restrain individuals from entering into competition with the Government, he had no objection; but when it was proposed to interfere with the public conveyances, and to make it penal for railroad cars and steamboats to convey passengers who, they might suppose, were engaged in carrying expresses, he was decidedly averse to its adoption. This was the point to which he desired to call the attention of the Senate.

They might as well undertake to make it penal for one individual to sell a horse to another, because he might possibly use the horse in the conveyance of private expresses. They might as well make it penal for an innkeeper to entertain a man, or for the authorities of a town to allow a man to pass through their town, if they suspected that he was carrying a private express. They had as good a right to do the one as the other. He believed, ordinarily, railroad companies had no right to refuse to carry a passenger who tendered his passage money, and who did nothing that was exceptionable. They were liable to damages if they should refuse; and yet it was here proposed to make them a sort of agent of the Government, to secure the monopoly sought for by the Post Office Department. There would be no limit to this sort of legislation if it were once commenced. It seemed to him an undue assumption of power on the part of Congress.

Mr. MERRICK said he would be as unwilling as any one to do an act which would involve the Congress of the United States in an unconstitutional proceeding. But it seemed to him that, in this case, there was no just ground for the gentleman's apprehensions. It being absolutely necessary that the Post Office Department should be sustained, it was the imperious duty of Congress to pass all such laws as were necessary to effect this object. The evil which they proposed to remedy was one which struck at the very existence of that department: he meant the sources of its existence—its revenue. They must, therefore, legislate so as to secure a sufficient return, in money, from the people whom the department served, to defray its expenses. This was the whole scope and object of this bill. He begged the honorable Senator's attention to the phraseology of the bill. The penalty was to be imposed only in cases where the conductors of railroads, &c., knowingly transported any individual engaged in carrying private expresses, in violation of the law; and leaving it entirely free, where no compensation was demanded, for individuals to act in the matter as they pleased. The whole object of the bill was to put down, with as little inconvenience as possible to citizens generally, the evil of permitting private expresses to be employed to the prejudice of the Post Office Department.

The further consideration of this subject was, on motion of Mr. LINN, postponed, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the special order of the day.

On motion, it was ordered, that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn till Monday next.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, which still continues the special order, came up, and the debate on the question of its passage was resumed from yesterday.

Mr. BERRIEN being entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate for about an hour and a half in opposition to the passage of the bill.

His objections were chiefly: First, that the provision undertaking to make a future grant of lands to settlers, is in contravention of the spirit and meaning of the existing treaty between this Government and that of Great Britain; next, that it is an inexpedient and impolitic time to legislate upon the subject at all; and, lastly, that this bill, under existing circumstances, is an injudicious interruption or interference with the constitutional prerogative of the executive department, which has notified Congress that a negotiation is pending in relation to this subject.

He agreed with those Senators who held that the provision guarantying to settlers a grant of land would be an infraction of the treaty. He agreed with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] not only in his opposition to that provision, but also in regard to the inexpediency, under existing circumstances, of attempting to carry out other provisions of the bill. With most of what had fallen from the other Senator from South Carolina he also concurred, though he was not disposed to undervalue the importance to our commerce of our right to the territory, or the advantages which we might derive from its occupation and settlement. But, taking the subject in all its bearings into consideration, he could not but believe that he subserved the interests of this country best by giving his vote against the passage of the bill.

He had every confidence in the purity of motive and patriotism of the gentlemen who advocated the bill; and participating with them, as he did, in the national feelings which excited their zeal, he could make ample allowance for the construction which their minds had been led to give to the treaty of 1818, and its renewal in 1827. This national feeling, however, he conceived had carried them too far. He had given the subject a calm and dispassionate consideration; and the result was, that, according to his best judgment, he had come to the conclusion that this bill would be a palpable violation of the treaty, and that England must so regard it. National rights were as dear to him as to any one; but national honor, and the imperative duty of keeping inviolate our plighted faith, were of such moment, that he would rather suffer loss than tarnish the purity of that plighted faith. But he had no apprehension that the postponement of action on this matter would have any tendency to the lapse of our interests in the Oregon Territory. We still hold our title to be as indefeasible as we ever did. We will make no concession that any other nation on earth can have as strong, as undoubted, and as just a claim, as we have. And, independent of all this, the circumstances under which we look to it as ours, are different from those which have influenced Great Britain to look to it. It is adjacent to us, touching our territorial border, part of our continent, best calculated for the habits and pursuits of our population. Oceans divide it from the British domain, and the objects which once rendered it valuable to her commerce are fast melting away. The sources of the fur trade are diminishing rapidly, and, at no distant day, we may fairly infer that England will cease to have any permanent interest in that region. Time, then, instead of lessening our chances of quiet and undisputed possession, acts in our favor, and operates unfavorably with regard to the interests of the power which is assumed to be our rival.

The probability is, if we but wait the natural progress of events, that we shall find ourselves quietly in possession of the territory long before the real wants of our population will demand its occupation by an act of Government. At present, we should consider that we are but one of the two parties entitled to equality of rights, under an existing compact. What we insist upon as our exclusive rights, may, and probably will, be insisted upon by Great Britain as her exclusive rights. And who is to judge between the parties? Certainly not one of them, on its own ex parte evidence. It is a matter of negotiation; and the executive department of this Government, to whom the Constitution has confided the power of negotiating with foreign nations, subject to the subsequent approval of the Senate, has notified the legislative department that a negotiation is actually pending. Mr. B., at considerable length, argued that the effect of this bill would be, in all probability, to obstruct or arrest an amicable and satisfactory adjustment of the question of boundary; which, if once settled, would remove all difficulty from the passage of such a bill as Congress might think necessary for the occupation and disposal of the recognised territory of the United States.

Mr. B. in the course of his remarks replied briefly to the various arguments of the friends of the bill, Messrs. LINN, WOODBURY, MOREHEAD, &c., and answered each by applying to them the main principles of his objections, as already substantially stated.

He hoped a majority of the Senate would concur with him in the suggestions he had thrown out as to the inexpediency of this measure, and give a negative vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ARCHER next obtained the floor, and declared his willingness to go on with the few remarks he had to make. But it had been suggested to him that he would probably have to advert to documents not at present in the Senate, but which could be procured by Monday; and he would therefore propose that the bill be passed over informally, and, if no other business was on hand, he would then move an adjournment.

On motion then, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till Monday next.

Mr. RIVES presented a memorial from David Irvin and others, praying the passage of a law authorizing the issuing to them patents for certain lands purchased from the United States, which patents have been withheld on account of some informality in the sale: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Bosworth, and it was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial very numerously signed, from the county of Chatauque, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Also, a petition from the county of Warren, New York, numerously signed, pointing out the manner in which small debtors, possessed of $500 or $600 worth of property, commit frauds on their creditors, through false appraisement of said property, under that provision of the bankrupt law securing $300 worth of property to the bankrupt; which memorials were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SEVIER presented a memorial from Francis county, Arkansas, for the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, presented a petition and documents from William Wynn, of Arkansas, concerning his claims; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. McROBERTS, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Richard Lewis, and others; which was read and committed.

Mr. GRAHAM made an unsuccessful motion for the Senate to proceed to executive business. Then,

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, the Senate adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 27, 1843.

Mr. A. MARSHALL presented memorials from merchants, shipmasters, and others, of Belfast and Wiscasset, Maine, asking such changes in the commercial arrangement with foreign Governments as shall give to the navigation of the United States such terms of just reciprocity as shall most conduce to the public welfare.

Mr. McKEON presented, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, the following petition, praying for a reduction of duties on pins:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned, interested in the importation and sale of the article of pins, respectfully represents

That, previous to the extra session of Congress, in 1841, said article was allowed to be imported free of duty. At that session, a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem was imposed thereon. At which rate, said article was imported to a very large amount, yielding, in revenue, many thousand dollars during the few months that the act was in force; that, under the tariff of 1842, the duty was raised, and now varies from 51 to 75 per cent.—the higher rates being imposed upon the inferior qualities, which are principally used by the poor; that the present rates of duties amount to a prohibition; there having been collected, under the present act, less than three hundred and fifty dollars for duties on said article imported into the city of New York to this date. Your petitioners further show that, as they believe there are but two establishments for the manufacturing of pins in the United States, they therefore pray for a modification of the present tariff, so as to reduce the duty on pins to a rate not exceeding 20 per cent. ad valorem.

[This memorial is signed by 85 of the leading mercantile firms in the city of New York.]

CHANGE OF THE HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. RUSSELL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That, from and after the 30th instant, the daily hour to which the House shall stand adjourned shall be 11 o'clock.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the resolution was carried; but

Mr. ARNOLD called for a division.

The ayes were counted, and numbered 42.

It being evident that there was no quorum present,

Mr. COWEN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS inquired if any one had any objection to the resolution.

Mr. FILLMORE said he hoped the mover would consent to have the commencement of the operation of the resolution postponed for one week, as the Committee of Ways and Means had much business before them, and it would be inconvenient to them if the hour was changed.

Mr. RUSSELL declined making the modification.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved to amend the resolution, by fixing on Monday week as the day when it should commence. This amendment was agreed to, and the resolution was then adopted.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON presented various memorials, asking for the passage of a law for the creation of $200,000,000 of Government stock, to be distributed among the States.

PLAN OF AN EXCHEQUER.

The House, then, upon the call of Mr. FILLMORE, resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of the exchequer—the question being on the motion of Mr. CUSHING to amend the resolution concluding that report, by striking out the word "not."

Mr. FILLMORE, who held the floor, addressed the House at length. He commenced by referring to the charge which had been put forth, that the Committee of Ways and Means, in proposing no affirmative action on the subject of the exchequer, had neglected to discharge their duty. In order to test whether they had, he should content himself by referring to the manner in which the question was presented to the committee, and in which it now stood before the House and the country, as admitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. More than a year ago, the scheme was first submitted to Congress, and then referred to a select committee, a majority of whom were the friends of the President. After two and a half months of reflection, this committee reported a substitute for the plan of the Executive, dispensing with its main features. If, then, any modifications of the exchequer were wanted—if the Committee of Ways and Means had neglected to discharge their duty in reporting modifications, he referred gentlemen to those reported by the friends of the Administration. The gentleman, too, who made the objection that the Committee of Ways and Means had neglected their duty in not reporting modifications, since they could not agree to the plan itself, had given notice that he would move to substitute the bill of the Secretary of the Treasury for his own bill, for the purpose of bringing the subject before the House in every possible shape. Now, he submitted it to the consideration of the House, whether the Committee of Ways and Means had not presented the subject in every shape possible, by not favoring either of the schemes? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had moved to strike out the word "not," so as to make the resolution of the committee an affirmative proposition. He would state, in reference to that matter, that he had himself risen and proposed the word be stricken out, thereby making the resolution an affirmative instead of a negative proposition. He could not see the difference between voting in favor of a resolution declaring that the exchequer should not be adopted, and voting against a resolution declaring that it should be adopted. If, indeed, there were any in the House, who, after the many discussions which had taken place, were unprepared to say whether they were in favor of, or against, the exchequer, he was sorry for it. He could not but admire the manly independence of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] who yesterday told the House that, although many of his constituents had petitioned for it, he must, after a close and careful examination of the subject, give his vote against the proposition. It was a determination resulting from an honest conviction of the heart, which he admired. He could not do otherwise than commend the spirit of the man who, when he found a measure to be right, resolved to hold himself ready to sustain it; and, if wrong, to condemn it. Nor could he think that there were men in the House who would take shelter of their opinions under a negative proposition. After some further remarks upon this head, he proceeded to an explanation of a position which was taken in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and which, he understood, was misconceived by some of his friends. He alluded to that portion of the report which spoke of the power of removal from office. It was in 1835, when the whole subject was under debate in the Senate, and when he also examined the subject, that he came to the conclusion that, where the power of appointment was vested in the President and Senate, in that case the President and Senate together alone had the power of removal. In support of the position he maintained, he cited the reasoning on the subject contained in the Federalist, which was at the time of its adoption held to be the true construction of the Constitution. In that work it was argued to the people, when the Constitution was pending before them for their adoption, that where a concurrence of the President and Senate was necessary to appointment, the same was also requisite to removal from office. The Constitution provided no power of removal. That only resulted from the power of appointment. He stated as a remarkable fact, that, although such a debate took place in 1835, he had not, after a diligent search, been able to get a printed copy of Mr. CALHOUN's bill. He found a manuscript copy, together with the amendments proposed, among the archives of the Government; and as it passed the Senate, the only principle asserted was this: it repealed the law limiting the tenure of offices to four years, provided that the only limit should be in case of defalcation; and declared that the President should assign his reasons to the Senate for any removal he might make. There was no principle in it which tended to limit the power of removal. Now, his own opinion was, that the President possessed no such power.

He noticed the objections which had been raised to a continuance of the present regulations of the Treasury Department, on the ground that the laws in force did not provide any place of security for the public money, and also that there were not sufficient provisions of law for the punishment of embezzlements. The gentleman from Massachusetts had argued that there were no provisions for the punishment of defaulters, except such as might be contained in the act of 1789, and the resolution of 1816.

Mr. CUSHING said his proposition was more qualified; and made another remark not heard.

Mr. FILLMORE alluded to the supposition entertained by some, that the Committee of Ways and Means had omitted their duty. He feared the House had forgotten their own action on the subject.

There were already existing by law ample checks and guards for the security of the public money. In the first place, there was the law of 1789, which provides that it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse them upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mark the words: "disburse them upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury." Then, what next? As to the medium in which the public dues shall be paid, we have (said Mr. F.) the joint resolution of 1816, which prescribes that they shall be paid in gold and silver, treasury notes, and the bills of specie-paying banks. Thus we have (said Mr. F.) the provision designating the officers who shall keep the public money; and next, we have the medium in which it shall be paid. Now, he wanted to know what more there was in the famous exchequer bill which came from the Treasury, or that of the select committee of this House, to secure the public treasure from embezzlement? Instead of calling the officer who is to have the custody of the public money, the Treasurer of the United States, the bill proposes to call them a board of exchequer, though one of them is to be this same Treasurer. First, there is to be the Secretary of the Treasury; second, the Treasurer of the United States; and then there are to be three commissioners to constitute this board of exchequer. The system now in operation was but a part of that "one idea" which provides for five officers, instead of one to do the same thing, and who are to be appointed in the same manner, viz: by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. But it had been said that there was now no security for the faithful custody and disbursement of the public money, and therefore the Committee of Ways and Means neglected their duty in failing to provide for it. Let us (said Mr. F.) look a little into the law on this subject. Gentlemen seemed to have forgotten that, in repealing the independent treasury, they left the penal part of it providing for the security of the public money untouched. They repealed the act so far as it relates to the receivers general, and the public buildings for the deposite of the public money, together with the provision requiring the public dues to be paid in gold and silver; yet the penal part of the act—which secures the faithful custody, transfer, and disbursement of the public money—this House had not the folly to repeal. Not only did they retain it, but they added to it. There were the most ample and the most penal provisions against anybody who should use the public treasure. In addition to the penalty imposed by the sub-treasury act, they had also provided for the evidence by which guilt should be ascertained—which the independent-treasury act did not do. Mr. F. then read from the act of 13th August, 1841, repealing the independent-treasury act, the following provisions:

"Provided, always, That, for any offences which may have been committed against the provisions of the seventeenth section of the said act, the offenders may be prosecuted and punished according to those provisions; and that all bonds executed under the provisions of said act, and all civil rights and liabilities which have arisen or accrued under said act, and the remedies therefor, shall remain and continue as if said act had not been repealed; anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any officer charged with the safekeeping, transfer, or disbursement of public moneys, or connected with the Post Office Department, shall convert to his own use, in any way whatever, or shall use by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan, with or without interest, any portion of the public moneys intrusted to him for safekeeping, transfer, disbursement, or for any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of the said moneys as shall be thus taken, converted, invested, used, or loaned, which is hereby declared to be a felony; and the neglect or refusal to pay over, on demand, any public moneys in his hands, upon the presentation of a draft, order, or warrant drawn upon him, and signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, or to transfer or disburse any such moneys promptly, according to law, on the legal requirement of a superior officer, shall be prima facie evidence of such conversion to his own use of so much of the public moneys as may be in his hands. Any officer or agent of the United States, and all persons advising, or knowingly and willingly participating in such embezzlement, upon being convicted thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay to the United States a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled, and shall suffer imprisonment for a term not less than six months, nor more than five years."

There was the law as it now stood. Were not these provisions penal enough to satisfy the gentleman? Had the Committee of Ways and Means neglected their duty, in not imposing greater penalties? If so, he would point them to the provisions of the famous exchequer bill, and then see if that measure provided better securities for the public money than now existed. Instead of prohibiting the public officers from using, investing, or loaning the public money, they were expressly authorized to do it. He asked if the Committee of Ways and Means had neglected their duty, when they said that these penalties for the unfaithful application of the public money were ample, and far better than the exchequer bill.

But he had occupied more time on this subject than he had supposed he would, when he commenced. He had a word to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and others, who had contended that this exchequer was not a Government bank.

That he might not misrepresent the honorable member from Massachusets, who spoke first, and den ed that this was a Government bank, he would read his remarks as published; and, if there was any mistake in the report of them, he desired that he would correct it. Mr. F. then read as follows, from Mr. CUSHING's speech on the exchequer bill:

"There existed now no bank of the United States, and very few specie-paying banks of any sort; so that, now, the public dues were received either in gold and silver or in treasury notes. The whole subject was placed at absolute discretion in the hands of the Treasurer, subject to the final discretion of the President. Under these circumstances, the President came to Congress, and asked to be relieved from this discretion—asked that Congress would define and limit it. Now, to an appeal like this from the Executive of the country, what did the Committee of Ways and Means reply? Their reply to the President was: 'No, you shall retain this discretion; we will not relieve you from it, unless in one specific way, and that only—viz: in the form of a joint stock charter for a bank of the United States.' This was the point to which the House were now brought."

On this assertion that the President had come to that House, and asked to be relieved from the discretion vested in him, and asked to have his power defined and limited, he would appeal to facts for an answer. How had the President asked to be relieved? The laws, as had been shown, required the public treasure to be kept in the custody of the Treasurer of the United States. The law, as it stood, declared that if that Treasurer, or any other officer intrusted with any other public money, should use it, or lend or invest it, or in any other way dispose of it, or who should refuse or neglect to pay it over when required to do so, the act should be taken and deemed to be an embezzlement, and should be punished with a fine to the amount of the whole sum embezzled, and imprisonment for not less than six months, nor more than five years. Now, what did this bill propose? Did it propose to put the public money in the hands of any other person or persons than those appointed by the President of the United States? No. On the contrary, it proposed to put the public money into the hands of a host of receivers; and not only that, but to put in their custody at the same place the hoards of private individuals. Did that look like a desire on his part to be relieved from responsibility? Thrice did Mark Anthony offer the crown to Cæsar on the Lupercal, and thrice did he refuse it; but he apprehended that the Executive had come to that House with no such feeling, when he asked to be relieved from his responsibility. He only asked to have it increased in a ten-fold degree; so that not only might he have the control of the public treasure, but of all the private funds and banking of the nation. But to return to the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman said: "Again the committee insisted that the treasury board was virtually a Government bank." Yes (said Mr. F.) we did insist that it was. The gentleman went on to speak as follows:

"Mr. C. had often been surprised—yes, and humbled, too—to observe how often words could be put, and that by very sensible men, in the place of things, and as a mask for the thing. The cry was, that this exchequer scheme was nothing but a plan for a Government bank. Why, so they might, with equal truth, say of every plan in which the treasury of the United States acts at all. If the exchequer was a bank because it received deposites, then the treasury was a bank too. If the exchequer was a bank because it afforded the means of transfer and exchange, then the treasury was a bank, for it did the same. Before we undertook to object to any measure on the ground of mere words—and words too often intentionally vague in their import—it became us to analyze the thing. Now, Mr. C. positively denied that the exchequer was a bank, in any sense of the word—popular or scientific; and he challenged gentlemen to show that there was in it anything analogous to a bank, which was not equally to be found in the treasury, either under the sub-treasury law, or as things now stood. It did, to be sure, perform acts which were in themselves the same as the acts of a bank."

Well, really—as the gentleman said—we must look at the intention of the thing, and what acts it has to perform, to make it a bank. He asserts that this is no bank; and then concludes with the unqualified assertion that it performs acts which were, in themselves, the same as the acts of a bank. Now, really, was there not some truth in the first part of the paragraph just read, in which the gentleman declared that "he had often been surprised—yes, and humbled, too—to observe how often words could be put (and that by very sensible men) in the place of things, and as a mask for the thing?" But the gentleman said that this was no bank. Had he attempted to give his definition of what a bank was? He said, to be sure, that it performed the functions of a bank; but still it was no bank. Sir, (said Mr. F.,) I have been somewhat puzzled myself to know what a bank is. He had a definition of a bank here, which he had transcribed from a work lately published, called "The History of Banking in the United States." According to that definition, a bank was "a commercial institution or repository for the purpose of receiving the money of individuals, and to improve it by trafficking in merchandise, bullion, or bills of exchange; and may be of a public or private nature." Now, if this was the true definition of a bank, the exchequer certainly was one.

In the first place, it was an institution or repository, in the language of the definition, for the purpose of receiving the money of individuals. This exchequer proposed a bank of deposite for the purpose of receiving the funds of individuals, and either to keep them in security professedly—how far it might do that, he would not pretend to say—or to improve them by trafficking in goods, bullion, or bills of exchange. This, it would be perceived, it was expressly authorized to do; for it was to deal in bills of exchange, by buying and selling them. There was the definition from one of the standard works of the country, which showed that this exchequer was a bank, and was from a writer who was disinterested, and, so far as he had given evidence of it, without prejudice on the subject. But Mr. F. did not press this definition of a bank. A long time ago they had a discussion on the sub-treasury, which was created for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, by means of the Government's own officers. This went far beyond the sub-treasury. That did not propose the buying and selling of bills of exchange; this did. That did not propose the receiving the deposites of individuals. That did not propose a board of directors; this did. That did not propose branches in the States; this did. It would, therefore, be perceived that it went beyond the sub-treasury in its likeness to a bank. He would now give the definition of the gentleman of a Government bank, as given in his speech on the independent treasury bill. It was headed "treasury bank," and was to be found in Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates for the year 1837, vol. 14, part 1st, page 883. Mr. F. then read the following from Mr. CUSHING's speech on that occasion:

"TREASURY BANK.

"Notwithstanding the disclamations of any desire for added patronage, under cover of which this project is introduced to us; and notwithstanding my unwillingness to suspect the President of insincerity in this matter, still I cannot exclude from my mind the conviction that a bank, a national bank, is the 'be-all and the end-all' of the new experiment. We begin with a large issue of treasury drafts having circulation as a currency. We proceed with yet larger issues of treasury notes expressly framed to be a currency. All these have got to be funded hereafter. Ultimately they may be of large amount. They not only constitute, in themselves, the basis of a treasury bank, but a sort of introduction to the use of Government paper as the paper medium of the country. Advocates of the new scheme admit that Government paper is to be the alternative and the substitute for bank paper. The sub-treasuries themselves, when they are put in full operation, drawing back and forth on each other, issuing and receiving large sums of money, and still more frequently issuing and receiving one kind or another, or paper credit based on the Government deposites—will be a genuine bank in everything but the name."

"In everything but the name!" Oh! what was there in a name? And who did the House suppose gave that definition of a bank? It was his honorable friend from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] He had quoted from Gales & Seaton's Debates of 1837, volume 14, part 1, page 883. He did not know but he might instruct the House by reading further from that speech; for it contained some good doctrine. The gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] had given them, in that speech, some good notions respecting Government paper, too; for he had covered the whole ground. He said, in reference to Government paper:

"We are to have a paper currency, recognised by the Government of the United States, and employed in its dealings; but it is to be irredeemable Government paper. This is the newest new humbug. The fever fit of gold money has had its day. That of paper succeeds it. If the scheme were not too laughably absurd to spend time in arguing about it seriously—if the mischiefs of a Government paper-money currency had not had an out-and-out trial, both in Europe and America,—I might discuss it as a question of political economy. But I will not occupy the time of the committee in this way. I am astounded at the fatuity of any set of men who can think of such a project. Has Law's Mississippi bubble—have the bills of credit of the colonies—has the continental money of the Confederation—have the assignats of the French republic—imparted no warning lesson to the present generation? It is, notoriously, of all the means by which a Government can raise money, the most liable to abuse of all currencies, the most impossible to maintain conformable to any fixed standard of value. We, in the time of the colonies and of the Confederation, did everything we could do to give to the paper of the Government the qualities of money. Did we succeed? You know that, in spite of all Government could do or say to prevent it, our paper money went on perpetually depreciating in value, until a hundred dollars of it could scarce pay for a breakfast."

Such was the description of Government banking, from the great advocate of that scheme. And there were some other things in that speech to which he might advert; but he would yield the floor, rather than occupy it for the few minutes that remained to him, if the House were ready to take the question.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved the previous question, and reminded the House that this was private-bill day.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for tellers, and they were ordered.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CUSHING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 66, nays 141.

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Arrington, Borden, Bowne, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burnell, John Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Clinton, Coles, Cowen, Cross, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, John C. So the resolutions were not laid on the table.

The question then recurred on the previous question, and tellers were called and ordered.

Mr. CUSHING withdrew his amendment to strike out the word "not" from the resolution of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, which affirmed that it was "not" expedient to adopt the Executive plan of the exchequer.

Mr. BOARDMAN and Mr. READ were then appointed tellers to take the vote on seconding the demand for the previous question; and they reported 98 in the affirmative, and 75 in the negative; so there was a second. The main question was also ordered to be put. The question then recurred on the resolution of the minority of the committee, which was presented by Mr. ATHERTON, in the following words:

And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill regulating the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys, in such a manner as shall, as far as possible, substitute provisions of law for executive discretion in the management of the finances; shall prevent the moneys of the people from being used for purposes of private speculation and emolument, and shall render the Government independent of the agency and influence of moneyed corporations.

Mr. PICKENS wished it to be understood that that was not a substitute for, but an addition to, the report of the majority of the committee.

The yeas and nays were called for on the amendment; and being ordered, resulted as follows—yeas 105, nays 116.

The question then came up on the adoption of the following resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means, viz:

Resolved, That the plan of an exchequer presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session of Congress, entitled "A bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department," ought not to be adopted.

And, the roll having been called, the result was—yeas 193, nays 19, as follows:

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BURNELL moved a reconsideration of the vote just given, and supported his motion with some remarks; which, from the noise in the hall, the reporter could not catch distinctly enough to report. After he concluded, he withdrew his motion.

Mr. CHARLES J. INGERSOLL renewed the motion for reconsideration. The first part of Mr. INGERSOLL's remarks were entirely inaudible to the reporter, in consequence of the distance he spoke from. When heard, he was understood to say that the monetary concerns of the nation belonged to the House of Representatives; and he desired to see the day when that sentiment shall prevail in all parts of the country. It would tend more to the settlement of our difficulties, the tranquillity of parties, and the interests and happiness of the country, than anything else that had been proposed.

In the outset of his remarks, he would premise that he opposed any measure presented by the present Chief Magistrate with great reluctance, because he felt under obligations to him for several of his public acts since he had been in the Executive chair. He felt thus both as a Representative and as a citizen of the United States; and would be happy if he had it in his power to coincide with him in the measures he proposed. He would further take this occasion to say, that he felt under a deep debt of gratitude to the President of the United States, for proving to this country a truth which it had not before been awakened to. It had been said, as a matter of reproach to the President, by a distinguished gentleman, that he was a President without a party. He would not say whether it was desirable or not that a President should have a party; but this he would say, that Mr. Tyler had been the instrument—possibly the unconscious instrument—of teaching these United States of America that there was a virtue in their Constitution that they had not been aware of; that the great functions of the Government, executive, judicial, and legislative, might be administered by the demise of the Chief Magistrate's bringing to the Executive chair a gentleman not intended for it. No man could contemplate the event without perceiving that, in this new and difficult aspect of our Constitution, everything worked well. He did not mean to speak in reference to party measures, for he was aware that many disapproved of what had been done and what had not been done; but he meant to say that, in this new state of things, there was no check to the working of our system of government, and it had gone on prosperously as heretofore. Though in the condition of parties, the aspect of things might be changed, yet, without extolling the present President, he wished the community to understand that, at all times, under such circumstances, the administration of this Government, or the functions of this Government, had been performed as usual; and we find true what Mr. Jefferson said—that this was the strongest Government in the world. He regretted, because of his personal relations with the President—which were of the most kind and friendly nature—that he was compelled to oppose any measure presented by him to this House; yet he had determined that he would take the earliest opportunity, not only of opposing this exchequer plan, proposed by the President, but he would take leave to add, as a matter of further opposition to him, that it had been proposed by the Executive at all. The act of 1789, which had been brought into view today, for the first time, was perhaps not as familiar to gentlemen as it ought to be. He had studied it with care, and had come to the conclusion that that act of Hamilton, Ellsworth, Ames, and others, framed by those who aided in framing the Constitution, contained the germe and basis of all we wanted; and that it was by departing from that germe and basis our subsequent difficulties had arisen. It was by going back as far as possible to that act, that the difficulties under which we now labor are to be overcome. Now he did not wish to be understood as referring to the independent treasury. He had voted for it when it was passed into a law, and he had voted for it to day; but he was not exclusively wedded to it. He was inclined to think that it never should have been made an Executive or party question; and that all we wanted was to insist on the principle contained in it. The act of 1789 was infinitely better than the sub-treasury, and possessed within itself all we wanted. We had, therefore, nothing to do but to go back to that from which the convulsions of parties had driven us. Shortly after that act was passed, the Bank of the United States went into operation; and how? Mr. I. here recited the resolution of Congress, which, he said, was construed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to report a plan for a national bank at the next session; and the consequence was, a bank became for a long time the keeper and disburser of the public funds, and, in the lamentable instance of the second Bank of the United States, became the despot of the Government. Immediately after the Bank of the United States came the State banks. The United States Bank of Pennsylvania was begun under the auspices of a highly distinguished gentleman, whose friendship he had the happiness to enjoy; and the Manhattan Bank, as he had always understood, was commenced under the auspices of the then Vice President of the United States. Both these banks were established to counteract the influence of the national bank. Things went on for years in the same way, under the suspensions in England, and expansions and contractions in this country, till this Government was nearly banked to destruction. He would say again, that the convulsion of parties had thrown us back again upon the act of 1789, for there was but little left of the sub-treasury. Let us, then, (said Mr. I.,) be cautious how we take a single step beyond that; let us look well what we do. What did the Executive recommend to them? He recommended a treasury bank; and though, for his own part, he had never been able to understand the horror expressed for such an institution by many honorable men of the country, yet he took it for granted that a treasury bank was much to be deprecated. He knew it was the opinion of Mr. Madison, as well as of many eminent men of the country, that a treasury bank, with a paper circulation, and with the power to regulate exchanges, was a most formidable and most dangerous institution! No Government should ever have his vote for such an institution. No Government, with his vote, should ever have the power to issue paper at all. He could not vote for it, unduly pressed on them, as he thought. He was not in the habit of being influenced by the public press; but, from what he saw, he thought the Executive and all its branches had made this project a favorite object; and this, with him, was a very strong objection to it.

After some other observations, which were very imperfectly heard, he alluded to the speech of the Secretary of State, delivered in Faneuil Hall, Boston, in which Mr. Webster said that, if there was any subject which he understood, it was this one; and he further said, that he was a bullionist. He (Mr. I.) denied that the Secretary of State was a bullionist; he denied that any man could be a bullionist who would give to the Executive of these United States the power to issue paper money that was not immediately convertible; and yet that was the project of Mr. Webster. Instead of such views being the emanation of a master mind, as they were called the other day, he, (Mr. I.,) an humble and comparatively insignificant individual, pronounced them crudities and puerilities. He was of opinion that, if he Secretary of State, instead of occupying his great mind (if great it were) on treasury projects, with which he had nothing to do, would occupy his great mind on what was the legitimate province of his department—the extension of commerce with foreign nations—he would produce more good, for he might aid in bringing the exchanges in our favor, by bending the energies of his great mind to that subject, instead of wasting them where they would be profitless. He had heard it suggested that the Secretary of State was before long to leave for England on a sort of Ashburton special mission, to make a commercial treaty between England and this counury; and he [Mr. INGERSOLL] would send him on that errand; for, properly regarded, it was a great errand. He further alluded to the admission by Mr. Webster in his Faneuil Hall speech, that a United States bank was an obsolete idea, which afforded proof that something was gained. He deemed much to be gained when Mr. Webster admitted a bank to be an obsolete idea; and if he would apply his talents, with those of the two Houses of Congress, to develop the resources of the country, its prosperity would be put on a more satisfactory foundation. The honorable gentleman made other observations, which were totally lost at the reporter's desk.

Mr. I. D. JONES next obtained the floor, and was assailed with cries of "adjourn," "adjourn," and "go on, go on." He said if any other gentleman wished to go on to night, he would yield to him the floor.

Mr. WISE said he had a few words to say, which he wished to say to night; and the gentleman from Maryland could have his hour to-morrow. He wished to make his observations to night, for the House was just waking up to the subject.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved an adjournment.

Mr. GRANGER called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE said he was willing to sit until candle-light, for he had just woke up like Rip Van Winkle, and he wanted to explain what had happened while he had been asleep.

The yeas and nays having been ordered upon the motion to adjourn, Mr. CAVE JOHNSON withdrew it.

Mr. ISAAC D. JONES then commenced his remarks. He said that his object in rising was to explain the reasons for his vote upon the resolution by which the exchequer scheme had been condemned—having been prevented from doing so this morning by the operation of the previous question. He referred to the fact, that the State-bank system had not an advocate in the country; and yet it was the only system now in force. Why should this system of keeping the public money be allowed to remain in operation, when it did not have a friend in the country? Congress had twice shown its preference for a national bank; but that had been as often vetoed; and it was, moreover, doubtful whether the stock of such an institution could be subscribed. He preferred even that the sub-treasury should be adopted, bad as it was, rather than the public money should remain in the hands of the Executive. He was unwilling to trust any longer to Executive discretion; therefore, he had voted against the resolution of the committee, by which the exchequer plan was condemned. In doing so, he wished it to be understood that the recommendation of the Executive had no influence upon him. He did not look to the quarter whence the scheme came; and he was the last man in the House who would yield anything to the Executive in the initiation of measures. When the House went into committee upon the exchequer bill, he should express his views at large, and the reasons which would induce him to vote for it.

Mr. ARNOLD next obtained the floor, and expressed a desire to address the House, because, as the "godlike Daniel" had remarked, he thought he understood the subject thoroughly. He would not, however, discuss the bill which this morning received so signal a defeat; because it would be like pouring water on a drowned mouse. After an expression of his opinion in favor of the bankrupt law, and a notice to the House that he should continue to call up his retrenchment bill, he moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE appealed to the gentleman to withdraw his motion, in order to enable him to explain the cause of his absence this morning, when the vote was taken upon the exchequer.

Mr. ARNOLD consented, provided the gentleman from Virginia would only speak ten minutes.

Mr. WISE said if there was anything which he spurned, it was the suspicion of dodging. He therefore asked the Speaker to inform him what questions had been taken during his absence. Which having been done, he said that to-day, for the first time during the session, he had felt the sensation of hunger, his health being bad. He retired to the lower part of the Capitol to snatch a snack, [A voice: "Briggs, do you hear that?"] and while there, he fell into a conversation which detained him from the House for some time. To his utter astonishment he found, when he returned, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL] on the floor, discussing the merits of the Secretary of State, the exchequer, and matters and things in general. As during his absence the House had voted upon the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON,] and also upon the resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means, and he would not appear on the journal of the House, he would make a request of the reporters of both papers to record nunc pro tunc what would have been his votes in case he were present. Upon the resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, he should have voted ay; and secondly, on the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means, he should have voted no. He hoped this declaration would vindicate him from any suspicion of dodging. Indeed, his constituents, and most of the members of the House, knew him too well to think he would resort to any such thing.

Had not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ARNOLD] put a limit upon him worse than the hour rule, he would go on and show the reason of the votes he should have given. He stated some of them yesterday. Nothing could induce him to vote for such a proposition as that brought in by the Committee of Ways and Means; for he well remembered his indignant feelings in 1837, when Mr. Cambreleng, from the Committee of Ways and Means, brought in the negative proposition that a bank of the United States ought not to be established. He then held that it was an abandonment of the legislative duty of Congress with regard to the currency. Therefore, with the same feelings of indignation, he would have voted against this negative proposition, regarding it also as an abandonment of the power of Congress over the finances of the country.

He then referred to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL,] and said he should be obliged to that gentleman—who was so bold as to say that Daniel Webster knew nothing about finance, judging by his Faneuil Hall speech—if he had informed the House what was his substitute for the exchequer.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said the law of 1789 with some modifications.

Mr. WISE remarked, that this was anything but a definition, according to Blackstone, and would throw open the whole field of experiment and exploration. The act of 1789 was to be condemned on many accounts, as had been remarked by his friend from Maryland [Mr. I. D. JONES] Moreover, the exchequer itself was but a proposition to modify the law of 1789. After some further remarks, Mr. W. expressed the hope that the House would, on to-morrow, go into committee on the exchequer, calmly discuss it on its own merits, and decide its fate without party recrimination, or reference to party objects. His ten minutes having expired, he concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. POPE requested the gentleman to withdraw the motion for the previous question for a moment; and, Mr. WISE (with the approbation of Mr. ARNOLD) assenting, Mr. P. explained that pressing and important business prevented him from being present when the vote was taken. He had no particular desire to vote on the resolutions, as he could vote on the exchequer bill, when it came up; but, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had thought proper to say how he would have voted, had he been present, he (Mr. P.) would do the same thing. He should have voted for the resolution, and against the amendment; for, until the 3d of March next, he was bound to his constituents to vote for a bank of the United States.

Mr. EVERETT then moved to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table; which was carried, without a division; and

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 28, 1843.

Mr. RIDGWAY presented a memorial, signed by 41 members of the Ohio Legislature, asking Congress to repeal the law which removed the summer term of the circuit and district courts of the United States from Columbus to Cincinnati: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TILLINGHAST presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of Rhode Island, relative to the rates of postage.

Mr. GILMER presented a resolution, (which was agreed to,) calling upon the President of the United States to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interests, any information in possession of the Government as to the negotiation of a treaty, or of overtures to treat, for the cession of California by Mexico to England.

Mr. BOARDMAN presented a petition on the subject of the warehousing system.

Mr. PICKENS said there was on the table a bill from the Senate for the relief of the Petersburg Railroad Company, which he desired that the House should now take up; and, if the House would agree to do so, he pledged himself to move the previous question, to prevent the consumption of the time of the House with that subject. The company wished a decision of the House, one way or the other.

Mr. COWEN objected, this being private bill day.

Mr. KEIM presented two petitions, signed by Wm. Green, Abraham Behm, and one hundred and fifty highly respectable Democratic citizens of Berks county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to create $200,000,000 of national stock to be distributed to the States: referred to the Committee on Assumption of State Debts.

Mr. READ presented the petition and documents of Lois Robinson, praying for bounty land, or half-pay for five years in lieu thereof: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of Sewall Lake, and 45 other citizens of Bucksport, Maine, for an additional duty on sawed lumber, firewood, spars, &c., which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. Also, the petition of Darius Dickey, of Jonesport, Maine, for remuneration for services rendered in the capture of the British schooner Industry during the late war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. GIDDINGS appealed to the House to take up the bills on the private calendar, yesterday having been occupied with a subject which superseded that order of business.

Mr. CUSHING objected, and moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; avowing his object to be to move to take up the exchequer bill. He had been so continuously reproved for not doing this, that he would in future make the motion daily, until he accomplished his purpose.

Mr. PAYNE inquired if the resolution respecting the refunding of the fine of General Jackson, was not in order during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER replied that it was a part of the business of the morning hour, if not set aside by a resolution of the House.

The SPEAKER put the question on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and it was negatived.

Mr. McKENNAN renewed the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] to appropriate this day to the private calendar.

This motion was agreed to after being modified, on the suggestion of Mr. PICKENS, so as to take effect after the morning hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee on Public Lands; after a brief statement of the necessity which existed for its passage.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases where a soldier of the last or revolutionary war, who was entitled to bounty land, has died without obtaining a patent for the land, and where application is made by a part of the heirs of the deceased soldier for the bounty land, it shall be the duty of the proper officers of the War and Treasury Departments to issue the warrant and patent in the name of the heirs of the deceased soldier, without specifying each; and the patent so issued in the name of the heirs generally, shall inure to the benefit of the whole, in such portions as they are severally entitled to by the laws of descent in the State or Territory where the soldier died.

The SPEAKER then called for reports from committees, and the following were presented:

Mr. McCLELLAN of New York, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of Stephen K. Jennings; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of citizens of Ohio, asking a grant of land in the Oregon Territory, and that it be referred to the special committee heretofore appointed; which was agreed to.

Mr. CROSS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported adversely on the petition of H. M. T. Moss.

Mr. GIDDINGS obtained the discharge of the Committee of Claims from the petition of citizens of Cayuga county, New York, praying that the fine of General Jackson, which the President, in his annual message, recommended should be refunded, should be given to the children of John Adams.

He also made an adverse report on the Senate bill for the relief of Stalker & Hill.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made several adverse reports; amongst which were reports on the petitions of Joseph Bowler and George Pool.

Mr. BREWSTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas H. Brown; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. TURNBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, moved that it be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of David Jones; which was agreed to.

Mr. CRANSTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill for the relief of John Skirving; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. FILLMORE presented documents from the War Department, communicating information in relation to the appropriation for holding a treaty with the Sioux Indians in 1841, and the authority under which Governor Doty acted in drawing the drafts for provisions and goods furnished to the Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MOORE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made an adverse report upon the petition of John H. Howard.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

This subject next came up in order, on which Mr. PAYNE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOTTS requested permission to make an explanatory statement. He said it would be recollected that, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL] addressed the House, some days ago, he laid down the broad principle that there was no legal authority to punish contempts by attachments, and on that point the gentleman challenged the legal knowledge of that House. And when he (Mr. BOTTS) addressed the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked him how the common law became the law of Louisiana; to which he replied, that the common law became the law of the State of Louisiana, precisely as it became the law of every other State in the Union. Since that time, he had met with an authority on that point, which he wished to communicate to the House.

He was then understood to quote Gordon's Digest, article 106, page 480, being the 14th section of the judiciary act of 1789.

Mr. PAYNE then resumed the floor, and said, on rising to address the House on this occasion, he felt somewhat as a gentleman who addressed the House a few days ago felt. He had reflected on this question, and on some parts of it he had wished to say a few words; but, by the adjournment of it from day to day, much of what he intended to have said had passed from his recollection, and he should now find it exceedingly difficult to strike on the train of thought which he had chalked out for himself. Besides, there was another thought in his mind, when he before wished to address the House on this subject. He had thought that, on an appeal to the justice and magnanimity of the House, there would have been found no difficulty in agreeing to this proposition; but he had since abandoned that expectation. The speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] had satisfied him that such were the trammels of party, that the appeal he had contemplated would be useless: he should therefore not appeal to this Congress at all, but he should look beyond it, to the American people; and in making his appeal to them—and they were the fountain of all justice, as of all authority on political questions—he had not the slightest doubt that his appeal would be heard, and that the time would come when an appeal to that tribunal would produce an effect which would so operate on this body as to force the passage of the measure under consideration. When this question was examined before that tribunal, it would be gaged by the square of justice; it would not be asked if its passage would promote the aspirations of any particular individual for the Presidency, or its adoption blight the hopes and prospects of other ambitious aspirants, who may be looking to that elevation. As he had said, it would be gaged by the square of justice; and the only question that would be asked would be, was General Jackson justified in the course he adopted at New Orleans? Was he justified or not? If he was, they would at once declare that this fine should be refunded; but if he was wrong, no human being under heaven would desire, he (Mr. P.) apprehended, that it should be done. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] asked where General Jackson got his authority to declare martial law at New Orleans; and as the question had been asked, he would proceed to answer it. He should not contend that either the Constitution or the laws justified General Jackson in declaring martial law at New Orleans: he conceded that point. He would go further; and admit that, so particular had been the people of the United States in the adoption of constitutions, that there was scarcely a constitution which did not expressly declare that the military was subordinate to the civil power; and the Constitution of the United States contained the same doctrine. Yet, notwithstanding all this, it did not follow that, in time of war, a case might not arise in which it was justifiable—nay, in which it was essential—that a commander should assume the responsibility of declaring martial law. The preservation of the army itself, and of the country, from an invading army, would furnish circumstances under which a commander would be justified in declaring martial law. The ground, then, on which he predicated the authority of General Jackson to declare martial law at New Orleans, were these grounds of self-defence which were paramount to all written constitutions and laws; and his defence and justification rested on the necessity of the measure.

He then cited the instance of the invasion of Florida by General Jackson at the time the territory belonged to the King of Spain, a neutral power. There was no authority for such invasion. Yet the country was inhabited by Indians, who were constantly committing depredations on the Americans; and who were incited thereto, and supplied with ammunition, by the English. General Jackson saw the necessity of invading this territory; for self-preservation was paramount to all constitutional law. The King of Spain earnestly protested against the conduct of General Jackson, and demanded his removal from command. But the General, then, had an able champion and defender—a man who should, at least, be authority on questions of constitutional law with a majority of this House. He referred to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS] Mr. P. then read an extract from the complaint of the Spanish minister, and the answer made by Mr. ADAMS on behalf of this Government. It was, indeed, difficult to find a more conclusive and ample defence of General Jackson, than that made by the gentleman from Massachusetts. That gentleman then said that General Jackson was governed by the most enlarged patriotism, and by a pressing necessity, of which he alone could be the judge. General Jackson did judge; and the consequences of his entrance into the territory of the neutral King of Spain were well known.

Now he contended that every principle involved in the invasion, by General Jackson, of a neutral territory, was also involved in this declaration of martial law at New Orleans. The question very naturally arose, Why was it that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who was formerly so able a champion of General Jackson, now turned round, at the end of thirty years, to become—he had almost said—the reviler and slanderer of him whom he once so powerfully defended? He would not say that the feeling evinced by the gentleman had its origin in the political contest of 1828; but he could tell the gentleman that others less charitable than himself not only thought such to be the fact, but were not backward in so declaring.

The next view which he took of the declaration of martial law by General Jackson, was the necessity of the case. Upon the establishment of the necessity of declaring martial law alone depended the justification of the General. If, therefore, it could be established that martial law was necessary when General Jackson declared it, he would demand the passage of this bill to refund the fine. In order to do this, he must advert to the facts as related in the history of the times. He read from Martin's History of Louisiana, to show that a large number of the people of that State were always adverse to a change in their government, and to becoming members of the Confederacy; that they were disaffected; and that they were ready to become traitors when occasion offered. He also read from the address of the British commander, when arriving in Louisiana, proclaiming to the people of Kentucky, Tennessee, and others, that, should they start aside, they might have money in abundance, and a good price for their productions. These patriotic individuals paid no attention to the proclamation of the British commander; and, for the honor of humanity, it was to have been hoped that none would be forced to aid the British commander in circulating his incendiary publication. But enemies were found who circulated the pamphlet, and scattered copies of it all over the country between Mobile and the Mississippi. There were, besides this, other evidences of the existence of treason. The Executive continued to inform Gen. Jackson that the country was filled with enemies and spies. Even one of the colonels was tainted, and contemplated a surrender to the British. He could not say whether the Legislature were infected or not; but, if he had its journal, he might, perhaps, put his hand on one or more propositions that would throw some light on the subject.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] had said that General Jackson acted merely upon vague rumor, and had not informed the public where he derived his information of the treason which existed. The gentleman from Virginia, it would be remembered, informed the House that he never read but one law book in his life. From this remark, it would be nothing more than natural to suppose that he had been equally negligent in reading the history of his country. He (Mr. P.) made no such charge, because everybody knew that the gentleman from Virginia was very well versed in the history of this country.

Mr. BOTTS said, that what he observed on a former occasion was, that General Jackson had not given any reasons for his suspicion of the existence of treason, so far as he (Mr. B.) had yet ascertained.

Mr. PAYNE remarked that he was proceeding on the supposition that the gentleman had omitted to read the history of the times. It would have certainly been improper in General Jackson to take the course he did, without controlling reasons.

Mr. BOTTS here inquired what history the gentleman had got his information from.

Mr. PAYNE said from Martin's History of Louisiana.

Mr. BOTTS said he had never read that book.

Mr. PAYNE resumed, and read a passage containing information of the treason then in progress, communicated to General Jackson by Colonel Duncan. He also read (to show that General Jackson did not act on vague and general suspicions) a passage from La Tour. How, then, he asked, was the city of New Orleans to be saved? How defended against a powerful invading enemy, except by declaring martial law? General Jackson saw and felt the responsibility of his situation, and he ordered New Orleans to be put under the same rules as a military camp. It was put under garrison; all the avenues coming into and going out of the city were blocked up, and all communication cut off between traitors within and the enemy without. The next thing was the publication, by Mr. Louallier, of an incendiary pamphlet, the object of which was to produce mutiny and disobedience to the orders of General Jackson. He was arrested, together with Judge Hall, (who became his accomplice,) by the order of General Jackson. On this head of the subject, he would remark, that there was an argument in the Democratic Review so full and conclusive, that he need not say anything more; but would content himself by having it printed in his speech when that should be published in full.

He then went on to argue that New Orleans could not have been saved, except for the declaration of martial law. The forces of the Americans amounted to but 3,000 men; many of them raw soldiers, undisciplined, inexperienced, and without proper arms. Against them, the enemy were 14,000 strong, of the best troops in the world. He referred to the fact stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING]—that the British arms were victorious everywhere but in America. Everywhere they had added a halo of glory to the conquering cross of St. George. The condition of England, too, was at that time entirely free from danger. She had nothing to fear from France. The star of Napoleon had set. There was no reason to fear an insurrection in Ireland: her altars had been cloven down, and their fires of freedom extinguished with the blood of Emmett. Thus left to contend with a power which had torn the diadem from the hero of Austerlitz, and broken up the confederation of the Rhine, it was the Americans alone—the Anglo-Jackson blood—which tore the lion from the conquering flag. He might say to the ladies of New Orleans, lovely and virtuous as they were, that, had it not been for the conduct of Andrew Jackson, their mothers and aunts would have been surrendered to the lusts of an infuriated soldiery.

He would tell the ladies of New Orleans more—that at this very time, when an effort was made to refund to General Jackson the fine so unjustly imposed on him, the Senators from Louisiana, in another branch of the legislative body, were voting against it—ay, voting against the remission of the fine to their defender. Let that go to them: he had no further remark to make on that subject. He had said that here he rested the claim of General Jackson to have this fine refunded to him—not as a gratuity; not as a remuneration for his distinguished services; but as an act of justice. He demanded it as an acquittal—an absolute acquittal—from the aspersions that had been so foully cast upon him. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] said, the other day, that General Jackson had received the amount of this fine from a subscription raised by the ladies of New Orleans; and that, instead of putting the money in his own pocket, as he had a right to do, distributed it among the widows and orphans of those who fell in the defence of the city. For this reason, the gentleman contended that the Government should not refund the amount of the fine. Now, did the gentleman suppose that General Jackson could have received this money as a gratuity or as a reward for his services? If he had done so, he would not have been Andrew Jackson. On the contrary, knowing that the amount thus raised by the gratitude of those whom he had saved from the outrages of a licentious soldiery could not be restored to them, he, in accordance with that benevolence and humanity which always distinguished him, recommended its distribution among the widows and orphans of those who had fallen in battle. He rejoiced that the gentleman from Virginia had brought this subject to the notice of the House. It showed that there was a deep sense of gratitude to their deliverer pervading all classes of the city. But the most remarkable declaration of the gentleman from Virginia was, that, in reading the history of General Jackson, he could find but one green spot in his life. But one green spot in the life of Andrew Jackson! Why, he could go back to his boyhood, when he was a prisoner in the British camp. While there, he was insolently ordered by a British officer to black his boots. Did he obey with the servile acquiescence of a timid and inexperienced boy? No; he indignantly refused, and told him that he was a prisoner of war, and not amenable to the exercise of such authority. Was not this a green spot in his life? But again: Look at the condition of the country during the last war, at the time when General Jackson was appointed to a command in the army. Our cities had been sacked; and the British flag had waved over the walls which surround us; and the northwestern frontier was deluged in blood; and the whole nation was in alarm. No sooner was General Jackson appointed, but the tide of victory was rolled back. victory to our arms succeeded victory, till the war ended in a blaze of glory at New Orleans. Look to the Creek war; the battles of Emuckfa, Talledega, Echota, and the Horse Shoe; was there no green spot there? Why, if they did not know the intelligence of the gentleman from Virginia, they might naturally suppose that he was as ignorant of the history of his country as he professed to be of law.

Upon all these grounds, the fine should be refunded; and refunded because it was unjustly imposed on him; because General Jackson acted from the necessity of the case; and, if he had not declared martial law, the wealth of the city, and, above all, its helpless females, would have become the prey of a brutal soldiery. Could an American Congress hold that it had no power to refund this fine? Look at the gratuity of $25,000 given to the widow of General Harrison. He did not vote for that donation, because he believed that this Government had no right to make gratuities. But here was a different case; here was an act of justice to be performed, and money to be restored, that had been unjustly extorted and withheld for nearly thirty years. Hull was paid for his perfidy and cowardice; and why should General Jackson be punished for his patriotism and courage? He disliked to speak of an American in the manner he was compelled to speak of Hull; but he must say that a large portion of the American people declared that he was highly tinctured with treason. This man, then, was rewarded by this very Congress, who refused to do justice to the defender of his country. He asked if the American people would tolerate conduct like this. Again: a bill had passed the House for paying the Massachusetts militia for refusing to serve under the orders of the General Government; yet the House could refuse justice to the man who had shed his best blood in the service of his country. The gentleman from Massachusetts, the other day, very insidiously brought the traitor Arnold in the debate, for the purpose of applying his case to that of General Jackson; and repeated the anecdote of the American who said, that if his countrymen had caught him, they would have buried with the honors of war the leg that was mutilated in their service, and hung the rest of his body. He could well retort upon the gentleman, and direct what point there was in the anecdote to him, and those who thought with him. He might say, that if Arnold were here now, before this Congress, they would (judging from its action in Hull's and General Jackson's cases) pension the treasonable part of his body, and hang up the leg that was wounded in defence of the country.

The SPEAKER here reminded Mr. P. that his hour had expired.

Mr. DAWSON obtained the floor.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL gave notice that he would on Monday ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act organizing the Treasury Department.

MILITARY DISTRICTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, in answer to the resolution of the 21st instant, requiring the Secretary of War to inform the House what (if any) change has taken place in the organization of the military divisions or districts of the United States since 4th March last; and, if so, the reasons for such change, &c., &c.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the abrogation of the present arrangement of the military departments, as adopted by the general order No. 40, issued on the 12th of July, 1842, and for the purpose of restoring the two military divisions as they existed immediately before the issuing of that order.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to amend the instructions by adding the following:

"And also to inquire into the propriety of abolishing the office of commanding general in chief."

Mr. STANLY said he had no objection to the amendment; but he would suggest to the gentleman to go farther, and inquire into the expediency of abolishing the army and navy altogether.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said he hoped that, in time, Congress would reduce both. He believed it essential to the good of the country that the army and navy should both be considerably reduced.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS accepted the amendment as a modification of his resolution; and, in that form, it was adopted.

The SPEAKER communicated a report from the War Department, transmitting 245 copies of the Army Register, in compliance with the resolution of February 1st, 1842: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Navy Department, in reply to a resolution of the House, showing the cost and progress made in building the iron war steamer, under the direction of Mr. Stevens, at New York: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GIDDINGS then moved that the House go into committee, for the purpose of taking up the private calendar; which motion was agreed to, and Mr. McKENNAN took the chair.

A joint resolution for the relief of Benj. Ogle Tayloe was taken up and read.

Mr. WM. SMITH said he must object to the resolution, until he heard some reason for its adoption. The resolution was, therefore, passed over.

OFFICERS IN THE BALTIMORE CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY submitted the following resolution, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House whether any addition has been made to the number of officers attached to the Baltimore custom-house, or to any department thereof, since the 1st of September, 1841; and if any addition has been made, that the Secretary of the Treasury be further directed to report to this House the names of such additional officers as have been appointed since the date above mentioned, the nature of their duties respectively, their day, and the date of their appointment. That the Secretary of the Treasury also inform this House what necessity existed, in the affairs of the custom-house of Baltimore, for any such addition to the officers thereof; and whether the said addition was recommended by the collector, or by any other officer of the customs of Baltimore; and if recommended by any other, by whom.

COMMANDERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the first proviso to the first section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1842," approved August 4th, 1842, be, and the same is hereby, so modified, as to allow of the addition, by promotion, of four commanders in the navy above the number limited and prescribed by the proviso aforesaid; and if the addition shall be made to the number of commanders as contemplated by this resolution, no further addition shall then be made to the number of commanders in the navy until the whole number shall be again reduced to that authorized and limited by the law hereby modified.

Mr. MERIWETHER objected.

Mr. ADAMS said, as objection was made, it was necessary that he should state that its object was to enable the President and the Senate to promote the commander of the late exploring expedition. There were now four officers who had precedence of Lieutenant Wilkes, whom it was necessary to promote before that officer could be honored for his services in an expedition which was productive of so much good to the country.

After a few words from Mr. MALLORY, Mr. MERIWETHER, and Mr. ADAMS, the resolution was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

DEFALCATIONS.

Mr. BURNELL submitted the following resolution, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to report to this House annually all cases wherein any officer of the Government has failed to settle his accounts for the current year, the cause of the same, and what proceedings have been directed in each of such cases; also, all defalcations which may have taken place during the current year, and the proceedings in relation thereto.

Mr. J. C. CLARK, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to authorize the examination and survey of the harbor of Memphis, Tennessee; which was read twice, and committed.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 30, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the State Department, transmitting documents received by the Caledonia, from United States consuls abroad, showing, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of August last, the cost of articles imported into the United States, during the months of July, August, and September last, at the ports from whence imported, &c.; which, on motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, was ordered to lie on the table for the present.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 26th inst., a copy of the report of an officer of the topographical engineers, on the subject of an iron pile light for Bartlett's reef, in Long Island Sound; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Memorials were presented by Mr. EVANS, from Thomaston, Newcastle, and Nobleborough, Maine; by Mr. CRAFTS, from Montpelier, Vermont; by Mr. SIMMONS, from Newport, Rhode Island; from shipowners, merchants, and others, engaged in commerce and navigation, representing that the mercantile navigation of the United States has suffered materially from the effects of the existing treaties, and the arrangements between the United States and Great Britain, the Hanseatic Republics, France, Holland, Denmark, Russia, and Sweden, respectively; and that those treaties and arrangements termed reciprocal have not proved reciprocal to the navigation of the United States; and asking that Congress would, so far as the treaties permitted, make regulations which would prove more reciprocal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVANS presented two memorials from citizens of Maine engaged in the lumber trade, asking that a specific duty may be levied, greater than the duty of the present tariff, on certain kinds of lumber imported from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia: referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. MILLER presented a memorial from citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, in which they state that they are very much in want of a proper currency, and ask Congress to issue $200,000,000 of scrip, based on the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, to be divided among the States and Territories, as a proper and ready means of relief: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAYTON presented a petition from Sarah Williamson, a widow of a deceased revolutionary soldier, complaining of the construction by the department of the pension act of July 7, 1838, by which she has been excluded from its benefit; and asking Congress to pass an act reversing that construction, to enable her to obtain a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, presented a memorial from members of the bar and citizens of New Jersey, complaining of the inconvenience resulting to them in consequence of the sessions of the United States courts being held in Burlington and New Brunswick, and praying the passage of a law authorizing them to be holden at Trenton for the future: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented six memorials from the city and county of Philadelphia, asking Congress to restore to Mr. Kendall his personal liberty, of which he has been deprived in consequence of the verdict rendered against him by the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia, in favor of Stockton & Stokes, for conscientiously discharging his official duty to the United States, under his oath of office as Postmaster General.

Mr. B. remarked that he would only say that he believed, with the memorialists, that Congress should not permit Mr. Kendall thus to be deprived of his personal liberty for conscientiously discharging his duty to his Government by protecting its interests. He hoped, therefore, that the Judiciary Committee, to which he proposed to refer it, would forthwith report a bill granting the relief petitioned for. [Mr. B. was here told that memorials heretofore presented on this subject had been referred to the Committee on Claims.] He believed, notwithstanding such reference, that the proper reference would be to the Judiciary Committee. It was properly a judicial question, and the remedy should come from that committee.

The memorials were then referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAGBY presented a petition from Farley D. Thompson, asking to be relieved from liabilities incurred as surety for Chilton White, late postmaster at Lagrange, Alabama: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial from certain persons of the United States residing in the State of Pennsylvania, ascribing all the distress and embarrassments of the country to the want of a proper and sufficient currency; and, as a remedy for these evils, they recommend that on the lands now unsold $200 000,000 of stock be issued to the States and Territories by the United States, and that the proceeds of the sales of these lands be pledged to the redemption of the same: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McDUFFIE presented resolutions adopted by the Legislature of South Carolina, against the tariff passed at the last session of Congress; which were referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a preamble and resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, (which were ordered to be printed,) expressing the opinion—

1. That the present tariff of duties should be modified, and that duties should be imposed with a view to revenue, and protesting against the principle of distribution.

2. That the repeal of the independent treasury was precipitate, unwise, and injurious.

3. That a bank of the United States is unconstitutional, inexpedient, and ought not to be re-established.

Mr. SIMMONS presented certain resolutions of the General Assembly of Rhode Island, on the subject of the reduction of postage on letters; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed, a bill having been reported for that object.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial, signed by 369 citizens of Louisville, Kentucky, asking for the extension of a portion of the laws of the United States over the Oregon Territory, for grants of land, and for the erection of military posts there: ordered to lie on the table, a bill for the purpose being now before the Senate.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from Samuel Raub, in which he represents that he has discovered an effectual mode of preventing the explosion of steam-boilers; and with a view to make the apparatus (for which he has a patent) free to every citizen of the United States, and cause a knowledge of it to be disseminated to every part of the Union, whether for boats, stationary engines, or otherwise, he prays Congress to purchase the patent: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel G. Skinner; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Also, reported back, from the same committee, with an amendment, House bill entitled "An act further to continue in force the act for the payment of horses and other property lost in the military service of the United States."

Also, reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, House bills for the relief of Richard Rush, and for the relief of James S. Calhoun.

Also, made a report (which was ordered to be printed) adverse to the passage of the bill for the relief of James Taylor, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of John Hutchins; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Also, from the same committee, to which were referred the resolutions directing an inquiry into the expediency of authorizing the State of Mississippi to appropriate $25,000 of the two per cent. fund belonging to her to the completion of the railroad from Jackson to Brandon, reported a bill in relation to said fund; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of Charles Gordon, owner of the schooner Two Sons, and the legal representatives of the crew of said vessel.

Mr. LINN presented a petition from Elias Knight and 103 others, of Calais, Maine, asking aid for removing to, and settling in, the Territory of Oregon; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. KING, the bill for the relief of Francis Pellicer was taken up, and recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, leave was granted to withdraw from the files the memorial and documents of C. Fox.

The following bills were read the third time and passed, viz:

The bill for the relief of William Russell and others.

House bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Twin.

Engrossed bill entitled "An act for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad and Banking Company, and the Grand Gulf Railroad Company, came up on its third reading; but was postponed on the suggestion of Mr. BUCHANAN, who had made application at the Treasury Department for information as to the effect of the bill on the revenues.

The bill to prevent the employment of private expresses upon mail routes, and for the prevention of frauds upon the revenues of the Post Office Department, was then taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. HENDERSON (who, when this bill was under consideration on Friday last, contended that some of its provisions were unconstitutional) admitted to-day, after further examination of the subject, that its provisions might be constitutional, yet he thought it was stretching the power of the Constitution unnecessarily. He would not say, then, that the bill violated the Constitution in any particular provision; but he would say that it was not doing a proper thing in an easy and proper manner. He approved of the bill so far as its object went to secure to the Post Office Department its legitimate revenue, by suppressing these private expresses on the mail routes, and preventing the transportation of mailable matter out of the regular mail; but he thought it was interfering too much with individual rights to attempt to accomplish that object by imposing a penalty on the owner or owners of every stage-coach, railroad car, steamboat, or other vehicle or vessel, which shall, with the knowledge of any owner or owners, in whole or in part, or with the knowledge or connivance of the driver, conductor, captain, or other person having charge of any such stage coach, railroad car, steamboat, or other vessel or vehicle, convey or transport any person or persons acting or employed as a private express for the conveyance of letters, packets, or packages of letters, or other mailable matter. If they had a right to impose a penalty on the owners of steamboats, stages, and railroads, for transporting any individual as a passenger, (which it is the duty of some of them by the laws of the States to do,) on the mere suspicion that the individual was employed as a private express; they had the right to go farther, and impose a penalty on landlords on such roads who might entertain or harbor said individual.

He was opposed to all force laws which ran too much into the regulations of civil society. He would always raise his voice against extending unnecessarily this interdict on society. The manner proposed was not the one most necessary and proper. He was in favor of the object of the bill, but was opposed to Congress laying out its arms to exercise the power of dictating to the owners of the railroads and steamboats whom they shall or shall not transport as passengers. He argued that the bill went far enough in the second section—as far as he was disposed to go—by enacting "That it shall not be lawful for any stage-coach, roadroad car, steamboat, packet-boat, or other vehicle or vessel, nor any of the owners, managers, servants, or crews of either, which regularly performs trips at stated periods on a post route, or between two or more cities, towns, or other places, from one to the other of which the United States mail is regularly conveyed under the authority of the Post Office Department, to transport or convey, otherwise than in the mail, any letter or letters, packet or package of letters, or other mailable matter whatsoever, except such as may have relation to some part of the cargo of such steamboat, packet-boat, or other vessel, or to some article at the same time conveyed by the same stage-coach, railroad car, or other vehicle. And for every such offence the owner or owners of the stage-coach, railroad car, steamboat, packet-boat, or other vehicle or vessel, shall forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred dollars—one half to the use of the informer, and the other half to the use of the Post Office Department—to be recovered by action of debt, or by indictment or information, in any court of competent jurisdiction in the United States; and the driver, captain, conductor, or person having charge of any such stage-coach, railroad car, steamboat, packet-boat, or other vehicle or vessel, at the time of the commission of any such offence, and who shall not at that time be the owner thereof, in whole or in part, shall, in like manner, forfeit and pay, in every such case of offence, the sum of fifty dollars, to the like uses, and to be recovered in like manner, as is above provided in the case of the owner or owners.

Mr. MERRICK was glad to find that the Senator from Mississippi, upon further examination of the bill, was willing to admit that there could be no constitutional objection to its provisions. He hoped that that Senator agreed with him also as to the importance of some legislation, to prevent the growing evil which the bill was intended to remedy. Mr. M. then went on to show that, unless the second section was agreed to, the object of the passage of the bill would be defeated; that frauds would be still perpetrated, and the department deprived of a great portion of its revenues. Individual rights were as well guarded as they could be in the second section of the bill, and at the same time to reach and suppress the evil complained of. That section had no application to any individual, except the person who might notoriously be employed as an agent for conveying mailable matter by private express; for it provides that—

"Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit the conveyance or transmission of letters, packets, or packages, or other matter, to any part of the United States, by private hands, no compensation being tendered nor received therefor in any way; or by a special messenger employed only for the single particular occasion."

Mr. M. then spoke at much length, pointing out the many frauds on the department through those private expresses, which had been placed on all the most profitable mail routes, and actually came so much in competition with the Government, by carrying mailable matter at one-third less than the Government, as to deprive the department of the greatest portion of its revenues; and thereby disabled it from reducing the rates of postage, which was so much desired by the people, and from extending greater facilities to the more remote and sparsely populated sections of the Union. He, in conclusion, said, that unless these private expresses were suppressed, and the Government had a monopoly of mailable matter, the Post Office Department would soon become a burden on the public treasury.

The morning hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. LINN, the bill was passed over informally; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being

THE OREGON BILL.

Mr. ARCHER, in a speech of considerable length, contended against the passage of the bill in its present shape. He replied to the arguments of Messrs. LINN, BENTON, and WOODBURY, and concluded by recommending the recommittal of the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, or committee of the whole, for the purpose of having it amended, by striking out that part which relates to the granting of lands to settlers.

Mr. YOUNG remarked that it was not his intention to detain the Senate long with the few observations he had to make, as the very elaborate discussion which the subject had received did not leave much that was new to be said. He thought, however, it would not be difficult to prove that this bill would not, and, indeed, could not, be viewed by Great Britain as an infraction of the existing treaty between that Government and this. He should not attempt to travel over the same ground so ably explored by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] in his statements of the foundation of our title. He should dwell chiefly on the fact, admitted by Senators on both sides, that our claim is prior and paramount to that of Great Britain. It would be necessary, however, to have a clear definition of what that claim is. He understood it to be based, in the first instance, on the discovery of the Columbia river by Captain Gray, in the year 1792. We have evidence of the admission of this fact, not only in the writings of British navigators, but in the recognition, by the British Government itself, of the name given by Captain Gray to the river. This discovery was followed up by that of the sources of the Columbia river by Lewis and Clarke, sent out by Mr. Jefferson for the purpose in 1805. Captains Lewis and Clarke explored the country, traced the river from its sources to its mouth, and took formal possession of the territory for the United States.

Our next claim grows out of the occupation of the country. The first settlement made in it was by John Jacob Astor, in 1811. In the war which followed, between this country and Great Britain, he was dispossessed; but in the restoration of Fort George (Astoria) to our Government in 1818, Great Britain recognised our right to that settlement, and, consequently, to whatever title arose out of it. In fact, up to that restoration, and long after, we never heard of any claim to the territory on the part of Great Britain. Here, then, we had an additional claim—that which grows out of the law of nations; for although, in the first instance, the law of nations recognises as the first claim priority of discovery, it further requires that the discovery shall be followed up by occupation; and we had fulfilled the condition. We had made the discovery by Captain Gray, and Captains Lewis and Clarke; and had followed it up by occupation, which was only interrupted by the force of war, but subsequently the possession was restored to us as our right; and from the date of that restoration, in 1818, we have never parted with the occupation. The negotiations then, and every negotiation since, show that we maintained throughout this whole period our title, rights, and occupation of the territory.

We never have abandoned one iota of our claims to its sovereignty. On the contrary, we have evinced an unwavering determination to maintain our rights. It struck him that Senators were mistaken who urged that Great Britain had exclusive occupation of the territory; or that, from the use she makes of the stipulations of the treaty, she can acquire any title. It struck him, also, that it was a mistake to think she will ever look to the territory for agricultural purposes. And herein lay a great difference between her views and ours. They are, in fact, different, and yet not conflicting. We want the territory for agricultural pursuits mainly. She looks to it for the main pursuit of her Hudson Bay Company, which is the trade in furs.

Now, it is in conformity with the law of nations that Indians—wandering tribes like the Arabs, or persons merely traversing a country for purposes of hunting, fishing, trading, &c.—have been regarded as no impediments to those who take possession of the soil for making a permanent occupation, and converting it to agricultural purposes. It was according to this recognised law of nations that Europeans settled on this continent, though it was at the time inhabited by the aborigines.

It was on this principle that the pilgrim fathers took possession of the soil of New England, and turned it to agricultural purposes, without breaking the law of nations by dispossessing the Indians who would not cultivate it. So in the Oregon Territory: the Hudson Bay Company, not having for its primary object agricultural pursuits, never had encouraged more culture of the soil than necessary for the temporary support of its employees. But, with our citizens, agriculture must be the primary object. And we have already a number of our citizens there engaged in this pursuit. There is no jealousy towards them on the part of the Hudson Bay Company, so long as they make agriculture their primary pursuit. What can be more convincing than this, that it is not for agricultural purposes the British look to the country? The apprehension, then, is entirely groundless, that they would view the occupation of the soil by our citizens as an infraction of the treaty. Great Britain never will want it herself for agricultural purposes. No British company of capitalists will ever run the risk of investing their money in such a speculation.

If, as some gentlemen suppose, such a company has been formed, it must soon fall to the ground; for it never will come to anything in practice. None but individuals living on the soil, and cultivating it for themselves, can fully realize its benefits. Our citizens are peculiarly suited for that purpose. Those who have gone there wish to remain, and others wish to follow them. They ask but the same protection of laws from us, which Great Britain affords to her subjects. They wish also to be assured of a grant of the lands they may reclaim from the wilderness. All this the Senator from Missouri proposes to do by this bill. He proposes to give them hereafter the grant they ask; to extend over them the Territorial laws of Iowa; and to establish a sufficient number of forts to give them protection from savage Indians. Now, may not all this be done without any infraction of the treaty? Mr. Y. here referred to a conversation between Mr. Gallatin and the British ministers, in the negotiation about the treaty, in which the British ministers themselves suggested that the laws of one of our organized Territories might be extended over the country, though we might not organize a new Government in it. They also suggested a plan by which forts might be erected, and the soil might be cultivated. How, then, can it give Great Britain offence, that we carry out, by this bill, her own suggestions? Our citizens already there give no offence, by occupying any portion of the soil they please in agriculture. On the contrary, the most friendly feelings are evinced by the employees of the Hudson Bay Company towards them. It is only when they engage in the fur trade, that they are looked upon with jealousy. We all know that both Great Britain and her Hudson Bay Company are governed by what they consider their best interests. Their friendly disposition to our citizens engaged in agriculture shows that they do not look to that as their object. Why, then, should we suppose they would object to any number of our citizens taking up land for agricultural purposes?

Mr. Y. here read the remarks of Mr. Greenhow on the subject. He also referred to the opinions expressed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. MOREHEAD,] the other day, with a view of showing that the Senator was mistaken in supposing the Hudson Bay Company had any object of making a permanent location of lands for agricultural purposes or settlements. The whole matter was explained by Mr. Lea. He says the greater portion of the settlers on lands are missionaries, who proceeded to the territory for the benevolent object of benefiting the Indians, by teaching them the truths of Christianity, and the usages of civilized life. In the pursuit of this object, it was found essential that they should occupy and farm some land—both for subsistence, and with a view of instructing the Indians in the advantages of cultivation, over the precarious means of supporting life before known to them. At the forts of the Hudson Bay Company, no more land is cultivated than is absolutely necessary to supply the wants of those engaged in the primary occupation of the fur trade. There is nothing like an effort or disposition to make permanent settlements. It is a mere temporary occupation. There is nothing even of a permanent character in the forts of the Hudson Bay Company. They are mere stockade-forts, perishable in their nature, and only calculated for defence against Indians. He mentioned all this to show there will be no difficulty in the way of our citizens settling in the country. The Hudson Bay Company can have no objection, and will make none, to agricultural settlements. Now, this being the case, what is there, really, in the present bill, to give offence? Not the appropriation of portions of the soil for agricultural purposes; for no objection is made to that now, nor will there be after this bill passes. Not the establishment of forts; for that was suggested by the British themselves, and the example has been set by them. Not the protection of our citizens by the extension of our Territorial laws over the territory; for they also suggested that, and set the example. Suppose they should object to any one of these things: can we not say to them, "You have done it; and if the treaty authorizes you, it authorizes us?" And as to the occupation of the fort at the mouth of the Columbia river: was it not Mr. Astor who first built it? and was it not restored to us in 1818, because the right of possession was in us? Have we not kept it ever since; and may we not now either repair it, rebuild it, or enlarge it, at our pleasure, without cause of offence? What else does this bill propose to do? To establish two Indian agencies. What objection can there be to that? It is well known to the British that our practice is to appoint Indian agents to protect and control the Indians in our territories. They know we have territory in Oregon, and Indians on it. They know that the duty of our Indian agents by no means interferes with their fur-trade. And with respect to the jurisdiction to be extended over the country, do we not propose to avoid any interference with British jurisdiction, by the provision that any subjects of England accused of offence under our laws shall be transferred for trial to British authority? No difficulty or objection can therefore arise out of that portion of the bill. The next provision is, that $100,000 shall be appropriated to carry out the measure. It was to be lamented that the treasury was in its present condition. But it did not seem to him to come well from the Senators of the old States to object to this small item of $100,000, and, in short, to every appropriation required for the new States and Territories. They should contrast the appropriations for the old States with those for the new; and before they object to the latter, judge fairly whether it was just or generous in them to become objectors. Yet how seldom were they disposed to mete out to the new States even the measure of justice. It was with the utmost difficulty the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] last session obtained an appropriation of $100,000 to remove some of the impediments to navigation in the Western waters. The usual annual appropriation for that object, so necessary, had been withheld for two or three years. In the just effort, too, to obtain an appropriation for the Western armory, did not the preponderance of the interests of the old States prevail to cut it down to the paltry sum of $5,000? Why should the condition of the treasury be constantly held up as an excuse for not doing justice to the West, while the most extravagant and useless appropriations are lavished elsewhere? Look at the appropriations recommended to Congress this session. May not ten-times the amount required by this bill be retrenched from them? What occasion is there for such an increased and extravagant naval establishment? Does not every one see that smaller vessels of war would do more service for the country than those large and costly frigates, too unwieldy to act with celerity or effect?

When all this would be duly considered, he was in hopes the Senators of the old States would drop their objections to this appropriation of $100,000.

He trusted he had established a sufficient number of points to show that gentlemen were mistaken in supposing this bill could create any difficulty with Great Britain. He had shown that our claim to the territory is the best claim; that we have a right paramount to any that Great Britain possibly can have; that we have priority of possession, which we have never parted with; that we can give no offence to Great Britain in doing what she suggested to us we might do, and what she herself has done; that the occupation of the soil by our citizens is a legitimate occupation for agricultural purposes, to which she, merely in pursuit of commercial objects, cannot object; that we make no direct grant, and only undertake to do it hereafter—a provision which, by the uniform and undeviating practice of our Government, is never carried out till we have extinguished all other claims of title, as evinced by our uniform extinction of Indian titles; and that we are only raising objections, which, if not raised here, never would be thought of by Great Britain. It would be very well understood by Great Britain that, as a negotiation is pending for the adjustment of boundary, (and he believed that was the only question at issue in the negotiation about Oregon,) this Government would not carry out the provision till that question was settled. The prospective nature of the provision would be so construed. The British Government could not help so construing it, knowing that, according to undeviating practice, we could not for some years (four or five at least) take the preliminary step of extinguishing the Indian title; without accomplishing which, we never make grants of lands. This is such a plain view of the case, that it seemed strange gentlemen should overlook it. Keeping it in view, they certainly could not find any provision in the bill justly meriting the objection that it could give offence to Great Britain. For his part, he viewed it in altogether a different light. He regarded it as he was sure the British themselves would regard it—as a great peace measure, instead of one calculated to produce strife. With these convictions, he should himself vote for the bill.

Mr. LINN did not rise to consume more than a very few moments of the time of the Senate. Indeed, he felt it unnecessary to do so, after the very lucid statement of the Senator from Illinois, placing the matter on the plain grounds on which it should be viewed. He (Mr. L.) should, therefore, not say another word on the subject of title, for that was conceded; nor was it necessary to recapitulate what had already been so repeatedly urged. He was sorry the preposition was made to recommit the bill, because he knew, at this late period of the session, it would be fatal; as a delay must arise which would, in all probability, bring up the subject again at too late a day to pass it through the other House, amidst the multiplicity of business at the close of the session.

This bill had been drawn up with great care, and with the special object of not leaving it obnoxious to the objection that it could be considered an infraction of the treaty with Great Britain. Indeed, so scrupulously had it been drawn up, that, instead of extending our Territorial laws over the country, merely as Great Britain suggested we might do, without being liable to objection on her part, that provision of the bill had been made to guard against any possible infringement on the rights of the subjects of Great Britain, coming under the operation of these laws; and it is provided that British subjects, accused of offences in our territory, should be handed over to British authorities for trial. The British minister told our minister how far we should not go; that is, that we should not organize a new government and laws for the territory; and the bill keeps clear of that, by taking their own suggestion of the means of accomplishing our object. With many of the positions of the Senator from Virginia he could agree, but he should draw opposite conclusions from them. For instance, they could stand upon the same ground as to what it was right to do; but, while the Senator conceived it inexpedient to do it, he would feel that, because it was right, it was expedient, and ought not, and could not, give offence. When it was done, suppose Great Britain remonstrated; what would be the natural course, but to say to her, Well, we did it because you did; you set the example; if we are wrong, you must have been first wrong; so let us both talk the matter over, like sensible people, and set it right. This would be the result, and not war. England could not help seeing that, if we committed a breach of the treaty, it was a consequence of herself having been first guilty of the same breach of the treaty. And as to her resentment being more likely to be provoked on a point of honor than on the mere question of territory, he should ask, Were we to be treated as if we had no points of honor at stake?—no appreciation of such feelings? Are we only to think of dollars and cents, and have no regard for our national honor in this matter? The Senate of the United States would be coming to a low pass indeed, if the expenditure called for by this bill were to outweigh the national honor at stake in the decision of the question. England is to jeopard her dearest interests sooner than permit her honor to be touched; but we are to do nothing to maintain ours. He never could, and never would, come to such conclusions. He knew the gallantry and the chivalry of the Senator from Virginia; and it was not, therefore, in disparagement of anything he had said that he made these remarks. He seemed to attribute to his (Mr. L.'s) colleague and himself a very pugnacious disposition towards Great Britain.

Mr. ARCHER disclaimed anything personally applicable to the Senators. It was to the general tone of the friends of the bill he had alluded. The Senator from Missouri was the last man in this body for whom he could entertain unkind opinions.

Mr. LINN continued: What the Senator had stated amounted to this,—that it was his apprehension the British Government might make the remarks uttered here against its grasping policy, a pretext for hostile feelings; and that, taken in connexion with General Jesup's letter on the subject of military posts in the territory, they could not help feeling resentment. Now, can the Senator, or any one else, suppose that Great Britain has any right to make objections to an officer of this Government freely expressing his opinions to the Executive, when officially called upon so to do; or that any Senator of the United States should be restrained from a free discussion of topics involving the interests and honor of our country, even if, in doing so, he is obliged to denounce the policy of a foreign power? Surely, any foreign power that would object to this freedom of discussion, must be only seeking for a bare pretext of quarrel. But he had no apprehension that this discussion would have any such effect. If it could have this effect, he would be glad to know how a quarrel was to be avoided. Nothing this Government could do to carry out its claims, or to assert its title to the territory, would be free from the same objections. There was no official act that could be devised—no possible step that could be taken, which would not be deemed conflicting with British interests. If we are to consult nothing but the preservation of harmony, we must remain perfectly quiescent, and let British interests grow up and overspread the territory without interruption or remonstrance. Let the Hudson Bay Company go on settling the whole country, and turning its entire resources to its own advantage; let her have undisputed possession of the Northwest territory, from the Russian settlements to Mexico, and she will rejoice. That is the only way in which we can please and gratify that company, and conciliate the British Government. Any one step we take, no matter how trivial, to secure or promote our own interests there, must lessen their satisfaction.

The Senator from Virginia must certainly have strangely misconceived his (Mr. L.'s) remarks, the other day, in relation to our loss of the fur trade. What he (Mr. L.) had stated was, that our fur trade, once amounting to $500,000 per annum, had dwindled down to $2,000. Not that the fur trade had been extinguished, or the fur animals exterminated, so as to make this difference; but that, to the amount of half a million of dollars annually, our fur trade in the Northwest territory had been usurped by the Hudson Bay Company. Through the supineness of our Government, the Hudson Bay Company had been allowed to supplant us in our own soil. The trade is not destroyed; it has passed from our hands into those of the Hudson Bay Company. The company has undoubtedly, in some cases, trapped out the country—that is, reduced the supply of beaver. But it takes care to resuscitate such districts.

He had placed this bill on three grounds of immediate national and domestic interest to this Government: First, it will give protection to our citizens on the western frontier of the new States and Territories against the Indians congregated there for the relief of the old States; secondly, it will protect what remains of our fur trade, and have some tendency to retain what we have lost; and, thirdly, it will, by the protection and encouragement it affords to our citizens going to the territory, or there already, induce that occupation which is essential to the maintenance of our title and our rights. In relation to the system of military forts, he was fortified in his estimate of their importance, by the reports of the executive departments, and the recommendation of the subject to Congress, made by three or four Presidents of the United States. How the principles of this bill can, on any rational ground, produce war with Great Britain, he was at a loss to conceive, unless she is determined to snatch at any pretext as an occasion for war. She has herself gone beyond the point at which she can recur to the treaty for a pretext. She has said we may go so far without infraction of the treaty; and we only propose to do what she has suggested. The bill proposes nothing inconsistent with the admissions of her ministers as to what we might do, and had a right to do. If his friend from Virginia meant to press his motion for recommittal, he hoped it would be with instructions.

Mr. ARCHER said he would have no objection. The select committee being discharged, he was at some loss to know what committee to make the recommittal to. Perhaps the committee of the whole would be the best. But the recommittal might be dispensed with, if the Senate would agree to strike out the provision relating to the grant of lands. He would first try that motion, reserving the right, should objection be made, of putting the motion for recommittal afterwards.

The question was then put for unanimous assent to strike out; but objection was made.

Mr. ARCHER then said that it had been suggested to him that it would be best to recommit the bill, generally, without instructions. He would therefore move to recommit it to the committee of the whole.

Mr. CALHOUN intimated his desire to speak on the subject while it was yet before the Senate. He would therefore ask the indulgence of having the bill passed over informally till to-morrow.

The bill was accordingly passed over informally.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Senate then went into executive session, and soon after adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 30, 1843.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN presented seven petitions of citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying Congress to relieve Amos Kendall from the pecuniary and personal liabilities under which he now suffers, for the faithful performance of his duty as late Postmaster General.

Mr. BREWSTER presented, under the rule, the petition of E. W. Clarke and 64 others, inhabitants of Oswego, New York, praying that the punishment of flogging may be prohibited in the United States naval service: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

TWO HUNDRED MILLIONS OF NATIONAL STOCK.

Mr. JOSEPH R. INGERSOLL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which had been referred several memorials, asking for the creation of two hundred millions of national stock to be distributed among the States and Territories, and the District of Columbia, by general consent made a report thereon, concluding with a resolution that it was not expedient to grant the prayer of the memorialists, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. I. said that there was also a report from the minority of the committee on the same subject; and his motion was, that both these reports be printed, together with 10,000 extra copies of them. In order that the House might have an opportunity of understanding the subject of these reports, before taking the question on printing the extra copies, he would propose that that question be laid over informally, for the present, by general consent.

Mr. EVERETT observed that, as this subject had been heretofore referred to a select committee, raised for that purpose on the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON,] he would move to refer these reports to the same committee.

Mr. JOSEPH R. INGERSOLL would merely say, that though the references of this subject to the Committee of Ways and Means and the select committee were of the same character, yet they were not identical. These reports were based on memorials, which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means prior to the reference of the same subject to the Select Committee.

Mr. PICKENS hoped that, before the question was put on the gentleman's motion, the minority would be allowed to make their report. [Great confusion in the hall, and a dozen members on the floor.]

Mr. CUSHING inquired what the question was. Was it on printing the extra copies?

Mr. PICKENS said, No. The proposition was to pass that question over informally.

The SPEAKER said that the motion of the gentleman from Vermont was to refer the reports to the Select Committee; but the first question would be on printing the ordinary number of copies.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the previous question.

Mr. CUSHING and several others rose to ask a question. [Repeated calls to order.] If his colleague (Mr. C. said,) persisted in holding on to the previous question before he knew what it was, he would insist on the reading of the reports.

The question on seconding the previous question was put and carried, and the main question was also ordered.

The SPEAKER was about putting the main question, when

Mr. CUSHING insisted on his right to have the reports read. He had no idea of half a dozen gentlemen calling the previous question on him, before he knew what the question was.

Mr. TOLAND called for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER said that the reports were received by general consent, and must override the orders of the day.

Mr. READ appealed from the decision of the Chair; but, upon explanation, withdrew the appeal.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The SPEAKER said that, if the gentleman from Massachusetts insisted on the reading of the reports, they must be read before taking any question.

Mr. CUSHING said that, if the House would allow him to ask a question, he would agree to dispense with the reading. [Cries of "Order, order."]

The Clerk then read the report of the majority; when

Mr. READ called for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER said that the motion to print was pending, and must have the preference.

Mr. EVERETT moved to lay the question of printing on the table; which motion was put, and negatived.

The question on printing the ordinary number of copies was then put, and carried.

Mr. EVERETT again moved to refer the reports to the Select Committee raised on the resolution of Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman from Vermont that his motion had been cut off by the previous question.

Mr. EVERETT said that that was on the question of printing only; that being decided, his motion was now renewed, and in order.

Mr. TOLAND said that he had called for the orders of the day previous to the motion of the gentleman from Vermont.

After some conversation between the SPEAKER and Messrs. TOLAND and EVERETT,

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOLAND] was right, and that the motion of the gentleman from New York must lie over for the present.

[The majority report being too long to be copied for this evening's paper, the reporter contents himself for the present with giving the report of the minority, as follows:]

The minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, assenting to most of the reasons and to the conclusions presented in the report of the majority against the prayer of the memorialists, asking the Federal Government to issue $200,000,000 of public stock in aid of the debts of the States, would also urge, in addition, (without pretending to go into anything like a full development of their reasons,) that they deem the exercise of such a power on the part of the General Government unauthorized by the Constitution.

The minority have always been induced to believe that the Federal Constitution was a compact to which the States acceded, and became parties; and that the powers of the Government accrued from that compact, and were defined in it. Before Congress is authorized to act upon any subject-matter, it must first be such a subject, over which power is specifically granted in that instrument, or clearly to be inferred as absolutely necessary to carry out some granted power. They can see no positive grant of power to Congress to authorize them to do what the memorialists desire.

To assume such a debt, and to create such a stock, binding upon posterity, is a very high exercise of sovereign power, and is, in itself, independent and substantive, and cannot be inferred as incidental to a grant over inferior subjects.

There is a clause in the Constitution which declares that "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." (Sec. 5.) This power was not given to pay the debts of the several States of this Union, but to pay the debts of the "United States." These words define the confederacy of States as a whole, and as contradistinguished from the separate and independent States. To assume that this power was given to authorize the Government to pay the debts of the separate States, contracted solely for their benefit and for their local purposes, is to allow the different States to contract debts, and, through the Federal Government, to bind others to pay them; which would make this Government subservient to local interests and to State authority, and absorb "the general welfare of the United States." If this should be the established principle of the Government, it would be directly stimulating each State into a wild career of reckless speculation, which would inevitably end in their separate existence, or in a consolidated despotism, where even their boundaries would be forgotten amid the universal despair that would follow the overthrow of constitutional liberty.

The terms "general welfare," in the Constitution, were designed as a mere declaration of extreme caution; and the true intent and meaning of those who used them was, that they should be a limitation to the apparently absolute and uncontrolled power given in the same clause—"to lay and collect taxes," "to pay the debts," &c. It was intended that this power should not be used wantonly or unjustly; but that Congress should strictly consult the "general welfare of the United States," and carry out the same only by confining its full exercise to objects specially enumerated in that instrument, and which are thereby declared to be national. These powers were not intended to be applied to local interests, or to State debts; but to those great national objects which were specifically declared by grants of power to be within the jurisdiction of the General Government.

It is not denied that this Government is one of limited powers, and that the Constitution is intended to define those powers. By merely assuming that it is national, you cannot effect objects not enumerated, or not essentially necessary to those that are. The convention has precisely defined those objects or powers that are national, and Congress cannot legally undertake to declare what shall also be national for other purposes not defined in the Constitution.

To do so, is to do nothing more nor less than to claim that Congress shall set up its own discretion as to the objects of "general welfare," instead of confining its action to the specific enumerated powers of the Constitution itself. If the "general welfare" be the only limitation on the discretion of Congress, why then any enumeration of powers at all? All power was at once given, and the judgment of Congress was thereby declared to be the Constitution of the confederacy. What right have we to set aside the judgment of the convention? They chose by enumerating the powers, to show what were intended to be national objects; and the very enumeration excludes the idea of legislation upon subjects not enumerated

The minority consider the proposition to pledge the faith of this Government for the redemption of $200,000,000 of public stock to relieve the States, or pay their debts, as involving the whole taxing power of this Government.

It is a proposition to tax posterity, not for the existence and independence of the confederacy, but for purposes unknown to the Constitution, and at war with those principles of liberty which secure to a free people the practical right to tax themselves alone, and to be protected from the lawless profligacy of those who may have assumed to bind them in all future time.

In all civilized countries, the line which limits the power of Government as to taxation, is the line that defines enlightened liberty. There are some of the States that owe nothing, and many but little; and to compel them to become jointly liable, by the action of this Federal Government, for the debts of the other States, would be an act of such gross injustice to them, that it would create feelings hostile to the permanency of the Union. The strength of our Union consists in the Government acting with wise forbearance upon subjects of doubtful import—in doing exact justice to all the parties—in imposing equal burdens—and mildly shedding around equal blessings upon all. By such a course, it will generate feelings of devoted attachment in a loyal and free people, who will be ever ready to defend it from aggressions abroad, or from treason at home.

The strength of the Government does not consist in arbitrary or great power, but in the attachment of an intelligent people to those great principles which make them free and equal. If the Government assumes a doubtful power, the exercise of which creates palpable injustice to whole communities, its operation will alienate the feelings of those who suffer, and loosen the bonds that keep the confederacy together.

The creation of such a Government debt would only end in taxing the productive industry of the country for the benefit of stockholders and speculators. Those who deal in Government funds, and live by the fluctuations of paper, might amass fortunes; but the great laboring class would be beyond the reach of its benefits, whilst they would be made finally to feel its burdens, in the future taxation of the Government to meet the vast obligations thus incurred. It is wild and visionary to suppose that the creation of such stock would add anything to the national wealth. It would only tend to make the industrious and solvent liable for the debts of the abandoned and profligate. The first immediate effect would be to swell expansion, and stimulate a bloated paper currency, which would be felt in foreign exchanges setting against us, and a consequent demand for gold and silver to adjust balances. It would place our local currency above the level of the currency of the world, and create a drain for our specie to equalize it. This, of course, would inevitably end in explosion, like the Mississippi bubble or the French assignats. Without intending to go into a full argument, but merely to suggest the general grounds of opposition, the minority look upon the whole scheme as unconstitutional, wild, and visionary, and full of fraud and the grossest injustice.

The undersigned, therefore, propose that the resolution of the committee be amended, by adding thereto the following words:

Resolved, further, That, to adopt the recommendations of the said memorials, would be unconstitutional, and dangerous to the harmony of the Union.

F. W. PICKENS,
JOHN W. JONES,
C. G. ATHERTON.

Mr. WISE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS hoped that resolutions would be received.

The SPEAKER said that a majority of the House could determine whether it would go into Committee of the Whole, or receive resolutions.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered; and, the question was taken, resulting in yeas 107, nays 83, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Arrington, Atherton, Barnard, Barton, Beeson, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, Burnell, William Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. So the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia in the chair.

EXCHEQUER.

Mr. WISE moved that the committee lay aside the army bill, which was first in order in Committee of the Whole, and take up the bill No. 206, amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department.

Mr. FILLMORE had certainly no objections to the consideration of that bill, but he thought the army bill should be first disposed of.

Mr. WISE begged leave to remind the gentleman that the army bill was postponed for a week, to make way for a negative resolution.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the committee take up his bill to reduce the pay of members of Congress and of the officers of the Government. He thought his bill much more important than either of the others.

Mr FILLMORE called for tellers, which were ordered, (Messrs. MOORE and STRATTON;) who, on counting, reported ayes 71, noes 82.

So the committee refused to take up the exchequer bill.

ARMY BILL.

The committee resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the army; the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. REYNOLDS, to strike out the appropriation of $20,000 for surveys west of the Mississippi, and insert $20,000 for a survey of a military road from the Council Bluffs to the mouth of the Columbia river.

Mr. REYNOLDS (imperfectly heard) commenced by calling the attention of the committee to certain documents, particularly the report of Colonel Totten, to show the necessity of a survey of this road before the Government can get the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory. There was a considerable opposition to the granting of land in that territory to the citizens of the United States, because there was a convention with Great Britain; but the same objections did not apply to the measure he proposed.

He thought it was high time that the Government should take possession of this territory, if they ever intended to do it. If they did not now, it would be extremely difficult to do it some years hence. The British Government, by their Northwest Company, had taken possession of the country, and formed trading and agricultural settlements. Mr. R. here went into an argument to show the right of the United States to the country; and deprecated the idea of our refraining from an assertion of our rights, because it might give umbrage to the British Government. He admitted that there was no inducement now to our citizens to make settlements in the country, unless the Government would encourage and protect them.

Mr. FILLMORE said it was very evident that if the debate should go on in this way, there would be no end to it. He understood from the Clerk that there was a special order, which would take up two or three days; and he would, therefore, suggest that the committee rise, in order that a resolution to take this bill out of committee might be offered. Mr. F. accordingly moved that the committee rise.

On taking the question, the result was—ayes 74, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. CUSHING called for tellers, and Messrs. DEAN and MATHIOT were appointed; and they reported 83 in the affirmative, and 39 in the negative. The committee therefore rose and reported progress.

Mr. FILLMORE then reported a resolution fixing 3 o'clock for the termination of debate on the army bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ADAMS requested the gentleman from New York to yield the floor to him, that he might submit two resolutions which he had prepared to present to the House to-day, which, by the rule, was resolution day. That order of business, however, having been passed over, he asked the gentleman to give him the opportunity to present them.

Mr. FILLMORE then yielded, with the expression of his desire that the resolutions would not lead to debate.

Mr. ADAMS then presented a resolution calling upon the President of the United States to inform the House by what authority Captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones had taken possession of Monterey in California, &c.

The resolution was objected to, and therefore it was not received.

Mr. ADAMS then submitted another resolution, which called upon the President of the United States for a copy of the instructions given by the President to Captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, at the time of his appointment to his present command, and of all communications which may have been received from the said Captain T. Ap Catesby Jones, in relation to the capture of Monterey; and also calling upon the President to inform this House if there had been any despatch transmitted recalling Captain Jones from his command.

This resolution was also objected to, and therefore was not received.

Mr. FILLMORE renewed his motion to fix the time for the termination of debate on the army bill, in Committee of the Whole; and, on the suggestion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, fixed half-past 3 o'clock. On this he moved the previous question, which was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put. The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which was agreed to; and Mr. HOPKINS resumed the chair.

The pending question, when the committee rose, was the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. REYNOLDS,] and its consideration was now resumed.

Mr. CUSHING said that the mode proposed to be adopted by the gentleman from Illinois was not the proper one in which to deal with that great question. It was well understood that there was a bill on the subject of the Oregon Territory now before the Senate; and the specific question involved in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would come before the House when the time arrived for it to pass on the bill which the Senate might send to them. It was, therefore, now premature to enter upon it, and he protested against its being now made a test question. He would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he was prejudicing the question which he wished to promote, by the course he was adopting; and he would suggest to him the propriety of withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON also opposed the amendment, mainly on the ground that he could not approve of that specific disposition of the appropriation, preferring to leave it in the discretion of the proper department, as the bill now proposed.

Mr. CROSS also briefly suggested that the gentleman's object would be gained by the survey which was necessary to mark the boundary line between the United States and Texas, which must be done pursuant to treaty stipulation; and, therefore, he suggested a modification of his amendment.

The amendment was then negatived without a division.

Mr. FILLMORE, in pursuance of instructions from the Committee of Ways and Means, offered an amendment, as was understood, to make a further appropriation for extending and rendering more complete the meteorological survey.

After a few words from Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, and Mr. FILLMORE, the amendment was agreed to.

When the committee arrived at the clause appropriating money for the support of West Point Academy—

Mr. ROOSEVELT submitted an amendment to cut off the pay of the cadets. The country (he said) furnished the cadets with a good education, and paid them for accepting it; and yet, in times when the country required their services, they sent in their resignations. He directed the attention of the committee to the resignations, when the service of these officers, who were prepared by the country, was required for the Florida war; and said he had no doubt an abundance would be found to avail themselves of the education which West Point afforded, without paying them for learning. He urged his amendment, too, on the ground that the state of the revenue of the country, as shown by a document lately placed on their desks, was such as to call for all practicable retrenchments. From the document to which he alluded, he derived the information that but $10,000,000 could be expected from imports for the current year; and if to this were added the amount that could be expected from the public lands, they would have but $11,000,000 to meet the expenditures of the Government—of $20,000,000, at the lowest estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury; though how they were to be reduced to that amount, he (Mr. ROOSEVELT) could not imagine. He suspected they would amount to $27,000,000, which must be met with $11,000,000, for they could calculate upon no more. Under such circumstances, it was time to look around them, and see what reduction could be made in their expenditures, that they might protect the credit of the country. True, the money paid to the cadets was small in amount; but the expenditures of this Government were made up of an aggregate of small items; and by this retrenchment, perhaps $20,000 or $30,000 might be saved; of the precise amount, however, he had not informed himself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired if there were not more cadets who had graduated, than could find employment in the service of the country. He also wished to know whether they were not kept as supernumeraries; and how many they were in number, and also how much the Government paid to them.

Mr. ROOSEVELT understood there were more graduating than the service of the country required; but he could not answer all the inquiries of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PROFFIT opposed the amendment, contending that it would cut off the sons of poor people from West Point, (many of whom, even now, could not raise the necessary outfit for their boys without the aid of friends,) and leave its doors open only to the rich.

Mr. GRANGER said the reason why West Point had fallen into disfavor, was because rich men availed themselves of it to educate their sons, and then withdraw them from the public service. He was of opinion that, unless great care be taken, that institution would be destroyed But respecting the resignations of some years past, to which allusion had been made, he said that was a time when the States were entering on public works, and the persons alluded to resigned, not from cowardice, but to enter the public service in other branches.

He next commented on the proposal of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROOSEVELT,] to withhold the pay of the cadets. If he remembered right, their pay was $16 a month, with rations. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] had, well described their condition. He (Mr. G.) had, in the course of his congressional life, appointed two cadets, and in neither instance had he sought political influence, or endeavored to confer personal obligation. In one instance, the parents of the youth had to make heavy sacrifices to provide an outfit for him, when he started to West Point; in the other, the young man was the son of a widow, and his friends had to make advances in order to enable him to enter. In both cases, he sought out those most worthy of the place, and who would be least likely to leave the army when their services were wanted. Of all the propositions submitted in relation to the institution, that of his colleague was the worst, and struck the heaviest blow at the poor.

It was the nature of an institution like the West Point Academy to run to ruin, unless carefully watched. Every new officer stationed there had some new scheme to propose, and each board of visiters brought forward something more grand than their predecessors. It was these things which were much calculated to influence the public mind against the institution.

Mr. MALLORY obtained the floor; but

Mr. ROOSEVELT rose to make an explanation. While up, [Mr. MALLORY not yielding, because of the shortness of the time left,] he was understood to say that he had not offered his amendment as the peculiar friend of the poor; but as one alike representing the interests of both rich and poor.

Mr. MALLORY said he desired to make a single remark. He believed West Point to be a good institution, and would do nothing to injure it. Yet, he was of the opinion that it was upon too large a scale. It should be reduced to correspond with the strength of the army. Unless its friends stepped forward and curtailed its expenses, it would be broken down by its own weight. The board of visiters, he thought, was a humbug, and ought to be abolished. Indeed, they were men of not sufficient science to enable them to examine the cadets and the institution. As other gentlemen were desirous of speaking during the remaining fifteen minutes, he would conclude by offering a proviso.

The proviso was read. [See a subsequent part of this day's proceedings]

The CHAIR decided it to be out of order at this time.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN said he was opposed to the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROOSEVELT.] It would banish from the institution all poor boys, and leave it open only to the wealthy—of whom there had been already too large a proportion there. Not that he wished only the sons of the poor to be educated there; but that they ought to have at least an equal chance—which they would not have, if the amendment taking from them all their pay was adopted. He would not say the pay of the cadets might not, and ought not, to be reduced; but sufficient for their support ought to be given them. If the whole of their pay was abolished, some of the most promising boys would have to leave the institution. The cadet he had selected from his district would be compelled to abandon it. His parents had too many children to support, to allow them to keep any one of them in such an institution. He had selected the boy alluded to from the public school of his district, because of his superior fitness for the station. At the time of his being selected, the boy maintained himself by delivering milk, each morning, at 75 cents a week. He hoped, therefore, if the institution was to remain, that its doors would not be closed to the poor of the country. If either class ought exclusively to be educated at the public expense, it should be the poor. They would be most likely, from necessity, to devote themselves to the service of their country in after life. The sons of the wealthy too often relied upon their wealth for support, and yielded no return to the country for the education they had received from it. But he was for keeping the institution open alike to all classes while it existed.

He was, however, opposed to the continuance of the institution altogether. It was in opposition to the whole nature and character of our Government. The General Government was not created to educate men to fill its different departments. It was not intended that it should train up men as inheritors of its power and places—of the offices of its army, navy, its legislative halls, or its executive departments; for, if the principle was to be carried out, it ought to educate men to be members of Congress and executive officers. This was not the genius of free government. He thought, when the people or the people's Government wanted officers or agents of any kind, they ought to have the whole body of citizens to select from, and take the best qualified. If this institution was abolished, many others would spring up among the people in its place. If the appointments in the army and navy were open to the best qualified to fill them, they would find, instead of a few hundred boys, thousands of full-sized, well-educated, ready-made men, every way prepared to do good service. If the competition were allowed, a military education would become a part of the exercises of ordinary schools and seminaries. Boys would be trained there for the army, for the law, or medicine, or civil engineering. There would be no lack, he said, of military educated men, when military educated men are in demand; the supply, like all other pursuits of life, would be fully equal to the demand. At present, the door of the army was closed to all who did not go through the West Point Academy.

Another objection to it was, that the country had to pay for educating many who never rendered any service in return. At the beginning of the Florida war, and when their services were required, they abandoned the flag of their country by scores. Out of the hundreds and thousands educated at that institution, how many—he might say how few—had ever rendered any important service to the country. What had been the facts recently stated on the floor of that House, when the subject of the coast survey was under consideration? Why, that there were not in the whole army and navy of the United States men competent to carry on that survey; and that the country must look to the private walks of life for the necessary talent and education to carry it on.

He did not wish to be understood as speaking slightingly of the officers of the army who had been educated at West Point, nor of the competency of most of them to perform all the duties required of them. On the contrary, he considered them generally as of a high order of military and scientific men; but, as officers, they had not generally shown themselves superior to the officers of the army who had been selected from the citizens at large. Our recent wars, and particularly the Florida war, had not developed any great military genius or acquirements. The officers of the revolutionary army, and of that of the late war, would not lose by comparison with those of the West Point academy, or of any other school. General Jackson, and the uneducated officers under him, had shown as much skill and bravery, and had had more success in their Indian wars, and before New Orleans, than would be found in all the wars and battles of all the West Point officers. It would be strange, indeed, if that institution had not sent out some good officers out of the thousands there educated; but, comparatively, they had been few. Even now, those educated there did not rank in the army higher than Colonel Kearney, and his dragoon officers, who had all been taken from private life.

It was needless, he said, to attempt to disguise the fact, that, throughout the whole country, there was a deep-rooted and widespread opposition in the public mind to the institution. Many States had instructed their Representatives and Senators to abolish it; and, but a day or two ago, Connecticut sent in her opposition. He did not wish to impute improper motives to any member of the House; but it was but too apparent that, if all the personal connexions of members with the cadets, and all other political and personal considerations thereby created, could be excluded, the institution would not remain another day.

If it must remain, he trusted all—even its strongest friends—would perceive the necessity of curtailing its numbers, as was proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MALLORY.] The army was being reduced, and there were already more cadets attached to it than were necessary to fill all its offices. If, therefore, it was considered necessary to educate boys to make officers for the army, it was not necessary, certainly, to educate them to be mere hangers-on to that army, at the expense of the public treasury—to be the "mere cankers of a long peace." These were not times for useless expenditure. The revenue of the country was far short of its expenditures. Retrenchment must be made somewhere, or the national debt would increase. It had increased, he said, and was increasing at a fearful rate; taxes had increased, and would have to be increased still further to pay it; and ought they to go on educating boys for the army and navy, and paying hosts of officers in both, to walk the streets of the cities in idleness? He was opposed to it all.

Mr. HOLMES said he imagined there would be but one sentiment in relation to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MALLORY.] It would root out the abuses of that glorious institution, West Point, and diminish the increasing feeling against it; whilst it would not impair its usefulness. He opposed the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROOSEVELT,] and thought it could not have been seriously offered. It might be—as gentlemen had said—that some officers resigned their places after having been educated at the expense of the Government; but he could testify that a number of those who volunteered to go and fight against the savages were educated at West Point; and, though retired to civil life, came when their country called them, and rushed to the battle-field. He replied to the doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROWN]—that Government should not educate any one to fill its offices. The contrary from what the gentleman wished was in practice every day. He referred the gentleman to the whole organization of the army and navy. The education of those who had to command must be begun somewhere. In the navy, it was begun with the midshipman; and in the army, with the cadet. If gentlemen, with their Oregon ideas, would precipitate us into a campaign in that territory, he wished to have men of science to conduct it; for it really seemed to him that they desired to conquer Oregon per fas aut nefas.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL advocated the West Point academy. He contended that it was not true that the cadets were educated for the army. They were already in the army, and in it educated as much as any soldier. It would be as reasonable to cut off the pay of the soldiers composing the army as of the cadets. He replied to the objection that officers educated at West Point had resigned, and pictured to the House the conduct of the gallant Dade and his compatriots who fell in Florida, and who received their education at West Point. He argued that the academy had had an important influence upon the military discipline of the country, as extended and improved by those who had there received their education and retired to civil life.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. ROOSEVELT, and lost without a division.

Mr. MALLORY offered an amendment, providing that no more cadets shall be appointed to the military academy after the 1st of July next, till otherwise ordered by Congress; and directing the Secretary of War to report a plan to Congress, at the next session, for the gradual reduction of the expenses of the military academy.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to amend the amendment, so as to reduce the number of cadets to one hundred; but this motion was rejected—ayes 27, noes 99.

Mr. A. C. DODGE offered the following amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That in all cases of appointments of cadets to the West Point Academy, the individual selected shall be an actual resident of the congressional district of the State or Territory from which the appointment purports to be made.

This amendment was adopted.

The question was then taken on the first clause of the amendment, as proposed by Mr. MALLORY, and lost—ayes 44, noes 83.

The question was taken on the second branch of the amendment, directing the Secretary of War to report to Congress, at the next session, a plan for the gradual reduction of the expenses of the Military Academy at West Point; and lost—ayes 46, noes not counted.

Mr. AYCRIGG offered an amendment directing the Secretary of War to report a plan whereby a person paying his own expenses may be educated at West Point: rejected.

Mr. TRIPLETT offered an amendment providing that hereafter there shall not be a board of visiters at the West Point Academy. Carried—ayes 89, noes not counted.

Mr. EVERETT offered an amendment providing that the number of cadets shall be limited to the number of Representatives in Congress; and that each congressional district shall be entitled to have one cadet, and no more, at the academy: carried.

The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON offered an amendment providing that no money appropriated by this bill shall be applied to the payment of any larger sum of money to the officers of the General Staff, the Quartermaster General's department, the Subsistence and Purchasing departments, the Engineer and Topographical bureaux, and Military Academy, &c., &c., than is now paid to the officers of the same grade in the infantry, and that all laws inconsistent with this proviso be repealed: rejected.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the committee rise: rejected.

Mr. BARTON offered an amendment, providing for the restoration of the civil, and the abolishment of the military superintendencies of the national armories: rejected.

Mr. SPRIGG moved to strike out the whole clause making appropriations for ordnance and ordnance stores: rejected.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the committee rose and reported the bill to the House.

The question then coming up on concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole,

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House, and the main question ordered.

Mr. CALDWELL moved that the House adjourn; which question was decided by yeas and nays in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 67.

So the House adjourned.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from shipowners of the city of New York, praying that a floating dock, on the plan of Mr. Gilbert, may be constructed at Brooklyn: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the joint resolution to establish in the States of Kentucky and Missouri agencies for water-rotted hemp, was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. YOUNG remarked that it had been suggested to him, by one of the Representatives from Tennessee, that an agency should also be established in that State, as a considerable quantity of hemp was raised there. He therefore moved to insert one agent for Tennessee. He would also make a similar motion in regard to the State of Illinois, for hemp was raised in that State. In reference to the hemp of Illinois, he would only say that he had presented a specimen to the Navy Department, and the Secretary remarked that it was the best specimen ever presented there. He was satisfied that in the State of Illinois, if an agency was established there, hemp would meet with very extensive cultivation. He did not desire to throw any obstacle in the way of the resolution; but, believing that there would be very small additional expense incurred, if an agent were appointed to each of the States of Tennessee and Illinois, and not knowing of any objection to such an amendment, he hoped it would be acquiesced in.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said that the resolution, as it now stood, only made provision for the two States (Kentucky and Missouri) which were largely engaged in the cultivation of this article, and in the preparation of water-rotted hemp. He thought it was time enough to create agencies in the other two States proposed, when they shall have made the same progress in the preparation of the article. The agencies would involve some expense. He submitted, therefore, to the Senator from Illinois, whether, under the circumstances, those States having yet cultivated so limited a quantity of the article, and having made no progress in the water-rotting process, it was necessary that agencies should be established there immediately. When the necessity arises for the creation of agencies in those States, no Senator would be more ready to vote for them than he would. He hoped the Senator from Illinois would not jeopard the resolution by moving, at this late stage of the session, an amendment which would make it necessary to return the resolution for action in the other House.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana spoke also of the progress making in the State of Indiana in the cultivation of hemp, 400 acres of which had been planted by one individual alone, and he was extensively water-rotting it; and however desirable it might be to have an agency in that State also, as the matter then stood he would not embarrass the resolution, at this stage of the session, with an amendment. He was willing that agencies should be first established in those States which had made greater progress in the culture and preparation of the article.

Mr. YOUNG remarked, that it was far from his intention to embarrass the passage of the resolution. He did not know, at the time when he made the motion, that the proposed agencies involved any considerable expense. As the Senator from Kentucky supposed the amendment might hazard the passage of the resolution, he would withdraw it.

Mr. BENTON remarked that the two agencies proposed in the resolution were general in their character. The inspections and purchases by those agents would not, therefore, be confined to the hemp of the particular State in which they may reside; but they can purchase the hemp of Tennessee and Illinois. These agencies would be established at such points on the rivers as would give the greatest facility to the hemp-growers of all the States.

Mr. KING did not understand what necessity there was for such a resolution as that now before the Senate. He was not aware that any encouragement from the General Government for this particular branch of farming was more called for than would be proper for the growth of breadstuffs for the navy. It was the beginning of a system of sending agencies from the General Government into the States, which would lead to such results that the very gentlemen now advocating this proposition would have to come forward the first, themselves, for its repeal. A system of favoritism would grow up, (for these agents could not help becoming the tools of influential men in local districts,) which would result in the purchase for the Government of the worst materials at the highest price, until what they would select would not be worth having. There could be no better way devised for supplying the navy with hemp for cordage and cloth, than that which now exists; whereby the Secretary of the Navy advertises for proposals and samples, and decides upon the best articles he wants, at the most favorable prices. Let the farmers who choose to grow hemp for the navy compete with the foreign article, and make it better and sell it cheaper, and it will insure a market for so much as our navy may require. All this should be done without this special interference on the part of the General Government.

Mr. ALLEN inquired of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] whether the Secretary of the Navy had not the power already, under existing laws, to appoint agents to examine and purchase hemp.

Mr. CRITTENDEN supposed he had. The Senator from Alabama seemed to apprehend that the agents that might be appointed in those two States, under this resolution, would soon become subjected to individual influence; and the consequence would be the purchase of worthless hemp for the use of the navy. He asked that Senator whether those agents would be more liable to individual influence, or more likely to purchase a bad article, than those officers employed at Boston or New York by the Government, to make purchases of the foreign article.

Mr. KING. They make their purchases by contract, on samples.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Well, then, the agent that makes the contract for the purchase, has to examine the hemp; and is just as liable, through individual influence, to purchase a bad article, as the agencies, if established in Kentucky or Missouri. To say that we cannot have a sufficient agency, is to say that we are a race of dishonest men. The Senator's argument was as much an argument against all human agency, as it was against the agency proposed in the resolution. It was really surprising that the Senator from Alabama apprehended no collusions and improper influences in the agents for purchasing the foreign article in the Eastern ports. Mr. C. then spoke at some length on the disadvantages to the hemp-growers of the West, in consequence of having to transport their hemp at a great expense, after it is prepared, to the Boston market, to undergo the inspection of the agent there; which hemp is frequently condemned by such agents, owing to the imperfect knowledge, on the part of the growers of the article, of the water-rotting process. The hemp thus condemned is left without a market; and is then sold, at a great sacrifice, for purposes of sacking. Now, if these agencies were established in Kentucky and Missouri, those engaged in the culture and preparation of the article would be saved at least the expense of transportation; for if the hemp was condemned at home, they would then manufacture it into something else. He had no doubt, if proper encouragement was given our own people who have turned their attention to the matter, sufficient hemp—better than the foreign article—could be raised in the State of Kentucky alone, to supply the wants of the navy.

Mr. BAYARD spoke at some length on the propriety of passing the resolution. He remarked that the Senator from Alabama would perceive that, unless some authority was given by the passage of such a resolution to establish agencies, no appropriation could be made for the object. The resolution was merely intended as a basis to authorize the insertion in the general appropriation bill of an item to defray the expenses; which could not be done under the rule, which excludes from that bill all appropriations except for objects authorized by law. If the resolution was passed, still it remains for Congress, after they shall have seen an estimate of the amount necessary to pay those agents and make the purchases, to say whether they would make the appropriation. Unless the appropriation was made, the resolution would remain as a dead letter on the statute.

Mr. LINN expressed a wish that the question would be taken without further debate; if that was not done, he would move to pass the resolution over till to-morrow.

Mr. McDUFFIE remarked, that the resolution involved a matter of some importance, and desired that it might be postponed till to-morrow, to enable him to make a few remarks. Then,

On motion by Mr. MOREHEAD, the resolution was passed over informally.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The unfinished debate on the question of passing the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon, came up as the special order.

Mr. CALHOUN, being entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate for upwards of an hour in opposition to the passage of the bill. The time and circumstances he considered most unpropitious for urging this measure. It could lead to nothing but the loss of the territory. And he had a much higher estimate of its value and importance than his distinguished and eloquent colleague [Mr. McDUFFIE.] The exercise of our sovereignty over it now, must inevitably lead to resistance on the part of Great Britain. That resistance could only result in our either retracting or maintaining our position. Should we have to retrace our steps, it would be to a position infinitely worse than that we now occupy. Should we persist, war must be the consequence. And what could we expect from a struggle of that kind in a region so distant, when everything would operate favorably for our opponents, and to our own disadvantage? It must end in giving to Great Britain the entire possession of the territory; and how then could we regain a footing in it but by negotiation? Was it not better to have the negotiation now in amity, than after a contest, amid unkind feelings?

Mr. C. pointed out, at considerable length, the consequences of a strife with England on this subject. He adverted to the unprepared condition of this country for it. He considered our present position the most safe, honorable, and advantageous we could, under existing circumstances, occupy. It was so considered by every administration since the convention of 1818. Time would do more for us than any legislation we could devise. The rapid advance of our population in number and progress westward, had been such within the past thirty years, as to justify the calculation that the period cannot be far distant when even the Rocky Mountains cannot stop its onward march. We gain strength by time. The British, on the contrary, will be weakened by those circumstances which will operate most favorably to us.

Mr. PHELPS could not concur in the views taken by those Senators who had spoken in opposition to the principal provision of this bill—that which proposes a prospective grant of lands to settlers. He argued that the right of occupation by our citizens was conceded in the admission that we might extend our Territorial laws over the territory. We could not have citizens to extend those laws to, unless they had habitations to dwell in, and lands to cultivate. The prerequisite of occupation was therefore implied. He took each provision of the bill successively, and maintained that there could be nothing inconsistent with the treaty in its purpose and objects. He read extracts from the correspondence of Mr. Gallatin, to show that the British ministers during their negotiation with him, admitted that we might do everything we now proposed to do by this bill. He dwelt at considerable length on the terms of the treaty, and the proper definition of its provisions; and concluded by expressing a hope that the bill in its present shape would be supported by a majority of the Senate.

Mr. RIVES intimated a desire to address the Senate on the subject. He believed he had some peculiar views, to which he would wish the attention of Senators might be directed; but the attendance was so thin, at that late hour, that he should ask the indulgence of the Senate to allow the bill to be passed over informally till to-morrow.

Mr. LINN would not object, as the Senator from Virginia desired a postponement, although he could wish that some further progress were made in the matter this evening. He had risen to make a single remark, which seemed to be called for, in consequence of what had fallen from the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] He alluded to the circumstance of Mr. Monroe's communication relative to the building of a fortification at the mouth of the Columbia river, for the protection of our commerce. While up, he would say a word in reference to the imputation of the introduction of this bill by him being a rash measure. Now, he contended there could be no objection to this bill on the score of rashness; for he had urged the subject in 1838, and repeatedly since. He had yielded to the experience and judgment of others, in refraining to press it to a final vote, while the difficulties with England were under negotiation. He now believed it would have been better if he had not yielded to that course. Had he pressed the matter forward, he believed the interests of this country, in relation to the Oregon Territory, would have been secured by this time, or at least would stand upon a better footing than they now do.

Mr. CALHOUN replied, briefly, that although he was Secretary of War in Mr. Monroe's administration, and knew it was a wise and prudent administration, he did not feel responsible for any of the measures of his Cabinet in which he had not taken part. As to the enforcement of this bill at any period since it was first proposed, the true question was, whether its provisions could be carried out if Great Britain resisted them.

Mr. LINN said that, as the Senator from Virginia wished the subject to be passed over informally till to-morrow, he should make no objection to that motion.

The bill was then passed over informally; and,

On motion of Mr. EVANS,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 31, 1843.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL presented two petitions of citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, setting forth that "Amos Kendall, late Postmaster General of the United States, is now confined within the limits of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in consequence of having withheld, while Postmaster General, the payment of a sum of money, said to have been due by the Post Office Department to certain mail contractors, but which he believed they were not justly entitled to; and praying Congress to pass such a law as will restore to the said Amos Kendall his personal liberty, and remunerate him for the loss of time and expenses incurred in defending the suits against him by the aforesaid mail contractors."

Mr. MOORE presented the petition of Reuben Drake, and 33 other inhabitants interested, praying for the establishment of a post route from Natchitoches to Monroe, Louisiana.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of Silvanus G. Pressey, and 75 other merchants and shipmasters of Deer Isle, Maine, for an appropriation to improve the navigation of Penobscot Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOYD presented the memorial of D. A. Green, and 88 other citizens of Smithland, Kentucky, asking an appropriation to remove obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi, Ohio, Missouri, and Arkansas rivers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

Mr. CLIFFORD asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire, and report to this House, what will be the probable receipts into the treasury, during the residue of the current year, from all sources; and also what will be the amount of charges upon the treasury during the same period; and whether there will not be a deficiency to meet the current expenses, and, if so, its probable amount, and what measures ought to be adopted to supply the necessary means.

Mr. STANLY objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. CLIFFORD thereupon moved a suspension of the rules, in order to get it before the House.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would withdraw his objection.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules. They were ordered, and resulted—yeas 88, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arnold, Arrington, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Burnell, William O. Butler, Green W. White, Thomas W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—76.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. J. YOUNG reported a bill for the relief of John McGinnis; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

REPORT ON GEN. JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. PEARCE asked leave to make a report, from the Committee on the Judiciary, on the subject of refunding the fine imposed on Major General Andrew Jackson. He said he was instructed to move the printing of five thousand extra copies.

Mr. RAYNER said that, inasmuch as this was one of the leading measures of the session, he should ask for the reading of the report of the committee.

Objection having been made, at the suggestion of the Speaker the presentation of the report was deferred until the Judiciary Committee should be called in its turn.

SCHOOL LANDS IN THE WEST.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported Senate bill No. 33, entitled "An act to authorize the Legislatures of Illinois, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in said States."

Mr. C. asked that the bill might be now passed, as it was important to three or four States, and had several times passed the Senate.

Objection having been made, Mr. C. moved the previous question on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. HOWARD objected to the bill, and moved that it be laid on the table.

Mr. STUART of Illinois wished to speak, but was prevented by the state of the question before the House.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to lay on the table—ayes 48, noes 126.

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

The question recurring on the demand for the previous question, it was seconded by the House, and the main question was ordered.

The main question being on the third reading of the bill,

Mr. HOWARD of Michigan addressed the House at some length in opposition to it.

Mr. STEWART of Illinois replied.

MrsA. V. BROWN moved the previous question, and it was seconded. The main question was then ordered to be put. On the passage of the bill the yeas and nays were called for, but not ordered. Tellers were then called for, and ordered; and Messrs. SNYDER and GRANGER were appointed, and they reported 70 in the affirmative, and 61 in the negative; so the bill was passed.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported, with some amendments, Senate bill to provide for ascertaining and disposing of the lead mineral lands in the States of Illinois and Arkansas, and Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa, and for other purposes. It was committed to the Committee of the Whole, and the amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRONSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to authorize the investigation of alleged frauds under the pre-emption laws, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. PEARCE, from the Judiciary Committee, moved that the report which was this morning laid on the Clerk's desk, respecting the refunding of General Jackson's fine, together with the minority report of the committee made at the last session, be printed, and that there be printed 5,000 extra copies.

Objection was made, and the usual number only was ordered.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Judiciary Committee, reported Senate bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Joseph Nourse, with an adverse report thereon. The bill, together with the report, was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MOORE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Burress; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. CROSS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of John Peters, deceased; which was read twice, and committed.

THE ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAMSON MASON asked the House to take up and dispose of the army appropriation bill, on which the previous question was yesterday ordered. He made this request for the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who was indisposed this morning; and he hoped the House would allow the bill to be disposed of, for there were only about twenty-one days remaining of the session, after deducting those days assigned to special orders. It was, therefore, very desirable that the House should now consent to act.

The bill was taken up by general consent.

The amendment of the committee making an appropriation for extending and rendering more complete the meteorological survey, was not concurred in.

The amendment requiring individuals to be hereafter appointed as cadets, to be actual residents of the congressional district of the State or Territory from which the appointment purports to be made, was concurred in.

Mr. McKENNAN called for the yeas and nays on the question of concurrence with the amendment, which provides that hereafter there shall not be a board of visiters at the West Point Academy, unless otherwise ordered by Congress; and being ordered, they resulted—yeas 109, nays 51.

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee provided that the number of cadets should be limited to the number of members and delegates in Congress.

The amendment was concurred in; also the amendment striking out the appropriation for the board of visiters.

The amendments having been passed over, the bill was ordered to its engrossment; and, having been read a third time,

Mr. BRONSON moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The bill was then passed.

The Committee on Enrolled Bills here made a report; and, after the several bills had been signed by the Speaker,

Mr. BARNARD inquired whether there was not a motion to rescind the special order appointed for to-day.

Mr. ROOSEVELT said he had made such a motion; but he did not purpose calling it up, unless more important business should come before the House.

The SPEAKER said it would be in order to call up the motion to-morrow, or at any time during the continuance of the special order.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. A. C. DODGE called up the special order of the day—the consideration of business appertaining to the several Territories.

Mr. D. said that, before he made a motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole, he desired to obtain a decision upon a motion made at the last session of Congress. He referred to the motion then made to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the bill to pay the militia of Iowa for services rendered in 1839, when called out during the unpleasant controversy with Missouri. The bill was rejected by a few votes, and he believed its merits were not properly understood. If members would give him their attention, he would endeavor to establish the justice of the claim. He inquired whether it was in order to debate the motion to reconsider at this time.

The SPEAKER answered that it was.

Mr. ROOSEVELT asked if it was strictly in order to revive a motion made at the last session of Congress,

The SPEAKER said that it remained on the calendar as part of the unfinished business before the House.

Mr. DODGE resumed. He read from the journal of the House at the first session of the twenty-sixth Congress, to show that a resolution was adopted, directing the Secretary of War to appoint an officer to muster the militia of Iowa preparatory to their payment. In accordance with this resolution, an officer was appointed, who mustered the militia, and made a report to the Secretary of War. That report was transmitted by Secretary Poinsett to the Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER, Speaker of the House, and by him laid before it. In that letter, the Secretary suggested certain corrections of the muster-roll, which were made by the proper officer, and also recommended that the troops should be paid.

[Here Mr. D. read from the letter of Mr. Poinsett referred to.] The objection raised last session to the payment of the troops, was, that the service in which they were engaged was uncalled for and unnecessary. Now, he (Mr. D.) stood upon that floor as the representative of those people who were called out by officers sent to Iowa by the United States Government; and he felt it to be a high and responsible duty which he owed them, to see that justice was done. He then proceeded to show that the men were called out by officers of the United States—the Governor and marshal of the Territory—and read passages from their several communications. The Governor of Iowa received notice that the authorities of Missouri were collecting taxes from the citizens of that Territory; and he immediately issued his proclamation, warning them not to execute their process. In the Governor's proclamation, the act of Congress on the subject was referred to, as making it obligatory upon him to do what he did. [Here Mr. D. read from the law.] The Governor was the officer of the United States, sent to afford protection to the inhabitants of the Territory over which he presided. So also was the marshal, who made the call upon the Governor, and who was fully sustained by the district attorney of the United States, his legal adviser. He then read the letter of the United States marshal, and commented upon it.

Mr. D. then read certain letters from the United States marshal, and the opinion of Charles Western, esq., the United States attorney, together with a letter from Stephen Whitcher, esq., to show the necessity that existed for calling the Iowa militia into service. Mr. D. also read the act of the Legislature of Missouri extending the northern boundary of that State, which he said precipitated and brought on all these difficulties. After reading these documents, Mr. D. said that the point he wished to make, was, that the Territorial Government of Iowa had exercised jurisdiction over the territory in dispute, ever since it was acquired from the Indians in 1833; and that the Legislature of Missouri invaded it with an armed force, for the purpose of wresting it from the United States and the Territory of Iowa, and levying taxes on it; that it comprised within it a population of six thousand persons, whose sentiments were so averse to the attempted usurpations of Missouri, that they resisted it to the utmost of their power; being backed in such resistance by those whom they were bound to respect—viz. the governor appointed over them by the Government of the United States; and the marshal, and the district attorney of the Territory, also United States officers. He would add, that it was a most unwelcome service to the people of Iowa; for, apart from their disinclination to oppose their own countrymen in arms, they were called out at a most inclement season of the year, when the ground was covered with snow. Could Congress, then, refuse to compensate for services rendered under such circumstances? They were not men capable of solving nice constitutional questions, but were the men whose enterprise had opened to settlement and cultivation a rich and fertile Territory, and who were in time to extend our borders by the settlement of Oregon. Such men were not nice casuists, and were, therefore, sufficiently justified in obeying the orders of their lawful superiors. He could tell the House, that such was the aversion to this service, that many of the officers—men of character and respectability—for refusing to obey the order calling them into service, were tried by a court-martial, under the militia laws of the Territory, and cashiered. There was another fact to which he wished to call the attention of the House. Every one of the generals, according to the construction of the War Department, had been stricken out of the account; and though there were eight of them in the field, not an officer above the rank of colonel would be paid. He himself was ready and willing to acquiesce in this decision, though it affected him, as one of the generals stricken out; for his anxiety to get the men paid the poor pittance they claimed for their hard service, and to get the farmers paid for the corn, beef, and pork they furnished for the sustenance of the men and their horses, superseded any feeling for himself, and those of the same rank with him. To add to the hardships of the case of these claimants, he would add, that at the time these supplies were furnished, the homes of a number of the settlers were proclaimed for sale by the President, and that they sold their produce for the purpose of raising money to pay for them; believing, as they were assured by those they had confidence in, that their accounts would be settled and allowed at the War Department. Now, in consequence of their not getting paid, as they had a right to expect, many of them were forced to borrow money, at a heavy interest, to pay for the homes they had settled and brought into cultivation. As he before stated, the service was a most unwelcome and most unpleasant one; and he desired to make an appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] who made a remark last year that he believed had caused the defeat of this bill. The gentleman, on calling for the yeas and nays, said that he wished to see who would vote for a bill to pay these people for fighting their own countrymen. Now, he would remark to the gentleman, that the people he spoke of in this way were by no means deserving of his censure. They engaged very reluctantly in this service, at the command of those placed by this Government in authority over them; and one of these men had faithfully served his country in the last war with Great Britain, and was present and saw the gentleman from Kentucky wounded and taken prisoner at Dudley's defeat. They were not nice judges of constitutional law; but the hardy and enterprising settlers, who had settled and brought into cultivation a rich and growing territory, and who would extend the boundaries of the United States, by settling and defending its territory, even to the Pacific ocean. He hoped the motion for reconsideration would prevail.

The question was then taken on the motion for reconsideration, and resulted in ayes 52, noes 43.

No quorum voting, tellers were ordered and appointed, [Messrs. BRIGGS and C. BROWN;] and the question being again taken, they reported ayes 74, noes 36.

There still being no quorum, Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table, and called for the yeas and nays, as the best means of getting a full vote.

Mr. MEDILL moved a call of the House: rejected—ayes 44, noes not counted.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON again called for the yeas and nays on the question of reconsideration, and they were ordered; and resulted—yeas 90, nays 45.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN and Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and resulted—yeas 89, nays 48.

So the bill was passed.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 1, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Patent Office, covering the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents; which, on motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial signed by twenty-three citizens of Pennsylvania, asking Congress to create a stock of $200,000,000, based on the public domain, to be distributed among the States and Territories in the proportion of their representative ratio; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER presented the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of the District of Columbia, residing on the eastern side of a branch of the Potomac, asking Congress to purchase one or more of the bridges across the Eastern branch, and to make them free: referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial from citizens of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, praying for the amendment or repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, presented a memorial from Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, in favor of the adoption of the plan for a board of exchequer, as recommended by the Executive: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BAGBY, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Jamison and Williamson; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PORT OF ENTRY AT GALENA.

Mr. McROBERTS introduced a bill to establish a port of entry at Galena, in the State of Illinois. He said he should move its reference to the Committee on Commerce; and, in doing so, would send with it a memorial from the city council of Galena, asking that a port of entry may be established there. He said, if the committee would read the memorial, he thought they would find abundant reasons for acceding to the request of the memorialists.

He would say to the Senate that Galena, according to the statement of the city council, contained a population of 3,000, and that some estimate could be formed of its commerce from the details which the memorial furnished. In 1842, the number of up-river steamboat arrivals at the place was 195, and the number of keel-boats towed by steamers was 160. The number of pigs of lead shipped at the port was 240,000, besides a considerable amount of lead in small bars. It also appears that the exportation of lead has increased from 11,000,000 lbs. in 1835, to 30,000,000 lbs. in 1841; this last amount, at three cents per pound, would be nearly a million of dollars. It is also shown that the importations to the city of Galena, in 1841, of merchandise, amounted to about one million three hundred thousand dollars.

The memorial presents some interesting statistics connected with the lead trade in the whole of the country upon the Upper Mississippi.

Mr. McR. said there were abundant reasons shown in the memorial why Galena should be made a port of entry, and he hoped the committee would recommend it accordingly.

The bill was read twice, and was, with the memorial, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the Committee on Finance was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of H. F. Pierment and John Golder.

Mr. MERRICK, on leave, introduced a joint resolution, to provide for the adjustment with foreign countries, by treaty, of the rates of duties on imports and exports, on principles of just reciprocity; which bill having been read,

Mr. M. remarked that he would not then ask for its second reading, with a view to its reference. The subject of the bill was a very comprehensive one. He merely wished it to be printed; and if, after an examination of its provisions, Senators should think any reference of it to a committee necessary, he would move to refer it to a select committee.

The bill was then ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, with an amendment, House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Peters, Moore, and Company."

Several adverse reports of standing committees, on private claims, were taken up and concurred in by the Senate.

The Senate then resumed the consideration, as in committee of the whole, of the bill to prevent the employment of private expresses upon mail routes, and for the prevention of frauds upon the revenues of the Post Office Department.

Mr. HENDERSON said he would be perfectly satisfied with the bill, if it was amended in two particulars—that was, by inserting in its second and fifth sections the words "and actually in possession of such mailable matter;" so as to make the penalty attach to the owners of stage-coaches, railroad cars, and steamboats, who may carry as passenger any person employed as a private express, only in cases where such agents may be actually in possession of mailable matter for transportation.

Mr. MERRICK said he had no sort of objection to the amendment, because it was exactly in accordance with the idea of the committee in agreeing to the provisions of the bill—its object being to prevent frauds on the revenues of the department, without placing unnecessary restrictions on the rights of the owners of railroads, steamboats, and stages.

These amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PORTER remarked that the provisions of this bill proposed to establish restrictions much broader than by the Post Office law of 1825. By reference to that law, it would be seen that the interdict only extended to letters; and left it optional to those who might wish to transmit newspapers and pamphlets, either to send them by the regular mails, or by other conveyance. But this bill places the interdict on all mailable matter—newspapers, pamphlets, and even the public documents, which he believed were mailable matter. According to the provisions of this bill, it would be penal for any person to transport any of the public documents, except through the regular mail. He objected to that portion of the bill which made it penal to transmit newspapers and pamphlets out of the mail, because it was a great convenience to the public to receive newspapers out of the mail, and in advance of it—which was the case now, to a very great extent; and yet it was no disadvantage, or a very small one, to the Post Office Department to be deprived of the carriage of them. Newspapers were sometimes actually conveyed from six to twelve hours sooner, by way of the Sound and Housatonic railroad, to Albany, than by the regular mail route between New York city and Albany. Now, anything which facilitated the transportation between those cities was of great interest to his constituents. He could not, therefore, consent to that provision of the bill which makes it penal to convey newspapers and documents out of the mail. He proposed to send home some documents of a public nature, which, if he should happen to place on board of a steamboat for that purpose, would subject himself to the penalties of the bill, for transporting mailable matter out of the mail. He would, therefore, to obviate his objection to the bill, move to strike from the second section the words "or other mailable matter whatsoever."

Mr. MERRICK said his honorable friend from Michigan was entirely mistaken as to the meaning of the words "mailable matter." He ventured to say that there was not a lawyer within the walls of the Senate, or elsewhere, if he were called upon to construe those words, who would not do so with reference to the existing laws, which defined what was mailable matter. Newspapers and pamphlets were not made mailable matter by this bill, but by previous law. The term "mailable matter" was used, because it was comprehensive, and included all matter other than letters, which by existing law was mailable. If these words were stricken out, the effect of the bill would be destroyed. Mr. M. further argued that, inasmuch as it was made the duty of the Government to carry newspapers and pamphlets in the mail, it should be secured in a monopoly of such carriage, as the expense has to be incurred by making provision for their transportation. It was necessary to have such a monopoly, to enable the department to transport the mail, unless it was desirable that that department should fall a burden on the common treasury.

Messrs. WOODBRIDGE, PORTER, CHOATE, HUNTINGTON, and WOODBURY, pointed out objections to the bill, which they expressed a wish that the chairman of the Post Office Committee [Mr. MERRICK] would consent to remove, by modifications of its provisions.

Mr. MERRICK replied to these several objections, and the bill was passed over informally till to-morrow, the morning hour having expired.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The unfinished debate on the question of passing the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon came up as the special order.

Mr. RIVES, being entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate for about an hour and a half in support of the general objects of the bill, but in opposition to the retention of the provision for a grant of lands.

He recognised and adopted to the fullest extent the reasons so ably and eloquently enforced by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN,] in relation to the national importance of the territory. He also concurred with him in the opinion that our interests and our rights must suffer irretrievably by any further delay on the part of our Government to take the necessary steps for the occupation of the territory by our citizens. With the exception of the mere formality of taking possession of Fort George, (Astoria,) after the war, in 1818, our Government never had done anything to obtain the occupation we claim as our right, or even the joint occupation in pursuance of the treaty. For nearly thirty years—since the breaking up of Mr. Astor's establishment in 1813—we had been out of possession, and the British Hudson Bay Company had been allowed the exclusive occupation for all practical purposes. However limited the views and objects of that company were for the first ten or fifteen years of this interval, it was in vain now to escape the conviction that these views and objects have been enlarged and extended so as to embrace agricultural pursuits, and the permanent settlement of selected portions of the territory. Pending the difficulties which had so long existed between Great Britain and the United States, in relation to the Northeastern boundary and other irritating subjects, the postponement of this question of the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory was, perhaps, the best thing that could be done, under the circumstances. Now that these leading difficulties have been so happily adjusted by the late treaty, it seemed to be the proper time for taking some steps on the part of our Government to preserve our rights.

Mr. R. reviewed the whole history of our title, and showed that it took its origin in the original charters granting to our ancestors the territory from sea to sea—from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He recapitulated the history of the Columbia river, and all the arguments of title founded on discovery; and from all these, he proved that we stood on quite a different foundation from that on which Great Britain would stand. We claimed the sovereignty as ours by right of discovery. But if we neglected the condition of the laws of nations, which requires that we should follow up the discovery by occupation, Great Britain might contend that our neglect was a waiver of our right. The terms of the existing treaty had, however, saved our claim on the ground of discovery; but we could no longer, with safety, refrain from some efficient act of joint occupation, consistent with our obligations and good faith under the treaty. He considered the provisions of this bill, with the exception of that proposed to be stricken out, were in strict conformity with the spirit and meaning of the convention, and such as would be perfectly unexceptionable. He therefore would vote for the recommittal of the bill; and if the provision for grants of land should be stricken out, he would give hearty support to the bill.

Mr. SEVIER hoped the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] would modify his motion, which he understood now was to recommit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, so as to make it to the committee of the whole.

Mr. ARCHER explained that, in consequence of the select committee which reported the bill having been discharged, he did not know what other committee than one of the standing committees the bill could be referred to. There was no committee of the whole.

Several Senators explained that in the Senate there was not, strictly speaking, a committee of the whole.

Mr. SEVIER said, if so, he would prefer having the question taken on the passage of the bill in its present form. On the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, he called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Considerable difficulty seemed to arise as to the recommittal of the bill; most of the Senators who had taken part in the discussion merely requiring that the land provision should be stricken out, so as to have a unanimous vote in favor of the bill. But the call for the yeas and nays not being withdrawn, the motion to recommit to the Committee on Foreign Relations had precedence.

Mr. ARCHER having asked for a suggestion to get out of the difficulty; and,

Mr. BUCHANAN having thrown out one, to the effect that the recommital might be to a select committee, admitting of the appointment of the same gentlemen who were on the committee that reported the bill, the motion to recommit to the Committee on Foreign Relations was withdrawn.

Mr. ARCHER then moved to recommit the bill to a select committee.

Mr. BENTON, on the question of recommittal being put, obtained the floor; but the hour being late, the subject was passed over informally.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN,

The Senate went into executive session; and, after some time spent therein,

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 1, 1843.

Mr. CHARLES J. INGERSOLL presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., for the passage of such a law as will restore Amos Kendall to his personal liberty, of which he has been deprived in consequence of a judgment obtained against him for certain of his official acts while Postmaster General of the United States.

Mr. RIDGWAY presented a memorial, signed by 35 citizens of Columbus, Ohio, petitioning Congress to repeal the law by which the summer term of the circuit and district courts of the United States were removed from Columbus to Cincinnati: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a memorial, signed by the members of the bar and other citizens of Marion, Marion county, Ohio, (in all 67,) of the same character, and the same reference made.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State to use their influence to procure the passage of a bill unconditionally refunding to General Jackson the fine, with interest and cost, imposed on him by Judge Hall.

[These resolutions passed the Senate of Maine by a unanimous vote, and by a vote of two to one in the House of Representatives.]

The Hon. Mr. CRAWFORD, successor to the late Mr. HABERSHAM of Georgia, was this morning sworn, and took his seat.

Mr. GARRETT DAVIS submitted the following resolution; and it was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House the number, classes, and compensation of every description of the officers, and all other persons connected with the collection of the revenues, in the employment of the United States, at the following ports, viz: Portland, Boston, Salem, Newburyport, New London, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston, Mobile, and New Orleans, on the 1st day of January, 1843, and on the 1st day of January, 1829, respectively; and that he also report the gross amount of revenue collected at each of those ports for the two years preceding those dates.

Mr. BOARDMAN offered the following resolution; and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to this House how he has expended the appropriation made at the last session of Congress for the purchase of the grounds adjacent to the General Post Office building; what use has been made of the property purchased; and whether, in his opinion, it is necessary and expedient for the Government to purchase the remainder of the grounds on the square.

THE ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON rose to a privileged question; and, having obtained the floor, moved a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday, by which the army appropriation bill was passed. His object was to move a resolution, if the House should agree to reconsider the vote, to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to strike from it every item which could be dispensed with, without detriment to the public service. For the three several days that the House went into Committee of the Whole on this bill, the entire time of the House was taken up with a discussion of some two or three minor points; while every gentleman knew, he presumed, that this bill contained a large amount of appropriations—something like $5,000,000. During that debate, the question was asked, (but never answered by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means,) what amount of revenue was expected for the coming year? If he could now get the ear of the chairman of that committee, he would again ask what amount was expected to be received during the coming year.

Mr. FILLMORE said he was too hoarse to address the House; but, if the gentleman from Mississippi would come to his desk, he would show him what the Secretary of the Treasury expected, from a document which that officer had furnished to the House. The honorable gentleman made some other observations, which did not reach the reporter's desk.

Mr. THOMPSON continued. From the estimates laid before them, it was evident the Secretary had greatly erred in his estimate. He had anticipated $16,000,000 from customs, when it was evident the sum could not exceed $12,000,000, and by many not more than $10,000,000 was expected. The Secretary of the Treasury had also estimated that $3,700,000 would accrue from the sales of the public lands; but in his (Mr. THOMPSON's) estimation, that was also a mistake; for he did not believe that more than a million and a half of dollars could be realized from the public lands. From the papers of this morning, it appeared that the officers of the Government had succeeded in borrowing $5,000,000; but in the fiscal year 1844, if they gave no power to the Secretary or the President to borrow more, they would have a deficit amounting to $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. Now he was one of those who, in his private relations, adopted this system—

Mr. JAMES COOPER rose, and asked if it was in order to discuss the subject at this time.

The SPEAKER was understood to reply that the gentleman from Mississippi was in order.

Mr. THOMPSON resumed. If they had no means of raising money, what should be the policy of this Government? They had attempted to borrow; and in that attempt they had failed. [Cries of "No, no, no!"] Abroad, they were disgraced and dishonored. They had succeeded, it was true, in now borrowing a sum of money; but who did not feel that they were disgraced by the manner in which it had been done? It surely was not a matter of felicitation; and he hoped there would be no further attempts to borrow; and he was willing so to make the appropriations as to avoid that necessity. And he wished to put this question as a test vote, whether gentlemen would so make the appropriations as to avoid the additional necessity of borrowing money.

Mr. DODGE of Iowa asked the gentleman from Mississippi to let the question of reconsideration go over to another day, that this day and to-morrow might be devoted to Territorial business, which was the special order for those days. Yesterday, much of the time was consumed in the discussion of a question in relation to land in Illinois and the army bill; and he trusted that the remaining time set apart for Territorial business would be given to it.

Mr. THOMPSON said he was quite willing to assent to such an arrangement.

Mr. SAMSON MASON hoped the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi would be disposed of this morning, for it was very desirable that the House should take final action on this bill as soon as possible, that it might go to the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON said he had but a very few remarks more to make. It was not his intention to make a speech; he merely wished to call the attention of the House to the fact, that if they proceeded thus to make appropriations, they should look to the necessary consequences of such a course. Last year, they passed a bill called the tariff bill—which was expected, he believed, by the committee who reported it, to yield a revenue of $26,000,000; but the prospect now was, that it would not yield more than $10,000,000. And as he saw no proposition made to reduce the duties fixed by that bill, he asked whether they would go forward and make appropriations, while there was no money to meet them. The consequence of increasing our tariff of duties had been, in a great degree, to destroy our commerce; and if appropriations were limited even to $20,000,000, he was of opinion that it would be more than the revenue would meet. They would necessarily, then, be driven to borrow money; and he asked, should they not rather strike out every item of expenditure which could be dispensed with, rather than borrow money under existing circumstances? They had attempted to borrow money to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government for three or four years, and he held that they should now stop that policy.

Before he concluded, he would make a remark respecting the Secretary of War. That gentleman had reduced the appropriations this year $1,800,000, for which he deserves the thanks of Congress. This was owing, in a great degree, to services dispensed with in the Florida war; and he (Mr. T.) was satisfied that still greater savings might be effected if the Committee of Ways and Means would state to him the impossibility of meeting such appropriations. But it would be impossible for him, or any other member of the House, without a consultation with the Secretary of War, to point out what items can be most appropriately dispensed with, and what items of appropriation can be properly and judiciously diminished.

Mr. GRANGER said he was in hopes that this bill, which was yesterday passed apparently so unanimously, would have been permitted to go to the Senate undisturbed, and without the lecture to this entire body from the gentleman from Mississippi. But that gentleman had not only read a lesson to this entire body, including his own political friends; but he had read a lesson to himself, for he had allowed this bill to pass yesterday, without calling for the yeas and nays, that he might record his vote against it; and yet he now rose and took the course which the House had witnessed. He (Mr. G.) could not suppose that the gentleman was seeking to create political capital; he was certainly far above that. But did he not seek to create the impression that this whole body had been trifling with the public interests?

He went on to observe that, in voting for that bill, he (Mr. G.) had not been actuated by selfish or local prejudices; for the army was more necessary to the frontier country in the neighborhood of the gentleman from Mississippi, than for that district from which he (Mr. G.) came. And, on the subject of the tariff bill, he said he was a high protective tariff man, up to the hub; and at the last session he recorded his vote in favor of a tax on tea and coffee, which would have yielded $4,000,000. Did the gentleman from Mississippi do as much?

Mr. THOMPSON said he had not voted for it.

Mr. GRANGER. No; the gentleman was opposed to a high protective tariff. They of the North, who went for protection, stood up in their places and supported a tax which would manifestly have produced to the treasury $4,000,000; and yet the gentleman from Mississippi rose in his place and talked as he had done about a high protective tariff. Such remarks would come better from some other quarter.

Mr. THOMPSON said he understood the friends of the tariff to say, at the time of its passage, that, independently of the tax on tea and coffee, it would raise something like $20,000,000.

Mr. GRANGER was understood to say that he thought the tariff, on its present basis, if undisturbed, would raise that amount; and though he was willing to give the additional amount that could be raised by the tax on tea and coffee, he believed the expenditures could be cut down to $22,000,000; and then there would be sufficient to cover their expenditures.

The gentleman, it appeared, was exceedingly alarmed about the credit of the United States Government. But he would tell that gentleman that, whatever their necessities might be, this Government had never yet denied its debts. The Government had raised—if he were to judge from the papers of this morning—or rather the officers of the Government had negotiated, their 6 per cent. loan at par. That was not doing very much with this tariff, even without the duty on tea and coffee, and with the honor and honest faith of this nation pledged for its repayment. But if it should not be repaid, why, there was the simplest process in the world: for they had nothing to do, if it were inconvenient to pay, but to "repudiate." The gentleman from Mississippi would see the immense advantage of repudiation; for, at the best, nobody but the purse-proud aristocrat, or some foreigner who had here invested his millions, would be the loser; while it would be, though certainly a novel, yet, doubtless, an equitable mode of distributing the money of the world among all the people of the world. [Laughter.]

The majority of this House had little reason to stand by the Administration; but they had good reason to stand by the honor and integrity and the plighted faith of this nation; and he trusted in God that the Representatives of the people—confident in the resources, and the ability, and the character of the seventeen millions of this American nation—would go forward, and make such appropriations as should sustain every arm of the national defence; and if it should be necessary during a temporary depression, to pledge the credit of the country to sustain even this Administration, like American patriots he trusted they would do it, and not be rebuked for discharging their high duty.

Mr. JAMES COOPER then obtained the floor, and moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion agreed to.

JUDGE BETTS AND CAPT. MACKENZIE.

Mr. SNYDER asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether Samuel R. Betts, district judge of the United States for the southern district of New York, refused to entertain a complaint of murder alleged to have been committed on the high seas, upon the ground that he had other business of a civil nature to occupy his time; and to report to the House the proper proceedings to be taken on the occasion.

Mr. BARNARD and others objected.

Mr. SNYDER then moved a suspension of the rules, in order to receive the resolution.

The motion was voted down, without a division.

On motion of Mr. JAMES COOPER, 500 extra copies of the report of the Secretary of War, on the subject of the Chickasaw fund, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINTHROP asked leave to present, and have referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, sundry memorials, signed by 2,107 citizens of Boston, complaining of the present state of trade and the derangement of the currency, and asking that the exchequer, with some modifications, may be adopted.

SPECIAL ORDER FOR TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. ROOSEVELT called up his motion to reconsider the vote by which three days were set apart for the consideration of business relating to the several Territories. He said that but thirty days of the session remained, whilst there was a vast amount of business before the House. He thought that three days was rather more than the proportion which should be assigned to the affairs of 100,000 out of 17,000,000 of people. He referred to the discussion which took place yesterday, when the whole day was consumed on the reconsideration of a bill rejected at the last session by a solemn vote of the House; and also mentioned the fact that Friday was set apart for the consideration of a bill in which the citizens of Florida were interested, and which would elicit much debate. He concluded by moving that the special order be rescinded.

Mr. POPE, after raising a question of order on the motion, contending that it was too late, moved that it be laid on the table.

This motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a resolution rescinding the call made upon the Secretary of the Navy for a copy of Lieutenant Wilkes's report and survey of Oregon.

The resolution was objected to in various parts of the House.

Mr. PENDLETON stated that the committee were informed that it would take a month to copy Lieutenant Wilkes's report, and therefore they could not get it in time to answer the objects for which they desired it.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. STOKELY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of certain companies of Michigan militia: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to authorize the purchase of the land adjoining the navy yard at Brooklyn, New York: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Ebenezer Wheelwright, and others, praying indemnity from the United States for French spoliations prior to 1800, report the following resolution for the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, on House bill No. 57, entitled "A bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens, for spoliations committed on their commerce prior to 31st July, 1801," shall cease on Tuesday next, at 2 o'clock, and the committee shall proceed to vote on the amendments then pending, or that may be offered to said bill, and then report the bill to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. CUSHING said it was evident that no bill of any importance could be decided, without the adoption of some such resolution as this. It was due to the suffering memorialists that the House should come to a decision upon this bill. He desired to have the previous question on this resolution:

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY opposed the resolution, on the ground that Tuesday next was appointed for the consideration of another subject.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON inquired whether it was in order for the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report a resolution fixing a day for the termination of the debate on a bill which had never been taken up in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CUSHING said three speeches had been made on the bill.

Mr. PICKENS said it had never been taken up. The Committee of the Whole had several times expressly refused.

The SPEAKER, after referring to the rule of the House, decided the resolution to be in order.

Mr. HOPKINS moved that the whole subject be laid on the table.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON rose to address the House, but was called to order. Several gentlemen attempted to speak.

The point of order was discussed by Messrs. CUSHING, J. P. KENNEDY, PICKENS, GILMER, CAVE JOHNSON, and the SPEAKER; turning chiefly on a question of fact, viz. whether the bill for the relief of claimants under French spoliations prior to 1800, had ever been taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

The House refused to lay on the table—yeas 93, nays 103, as follows:

So the motion to lay the subject on the table was rejected.

The question was then taken on the demand for the previous question, and carried—ayes 82, noes 74.

Mr. TURNEY then called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were ordered, and resulted in yeas 90, nays 95.

So the House refused to order the main question, and

The SPEAKER said that it would have to lie over till to-morrow.

CAPTURE OF MONTEREY.

Mr. ADAMS offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House by what authority, and under whose instructions, Captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, commander of the squadron of the United States in the Pacific ocean, did, on or about the 19th of October last, invade in warlike array the territories of the Mexican Republic, take possession of the town of Monterey, and declare himself commander of the naval and military expedition for the occupation of the Californias.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House copies of all the instructions given by him, or under his authority, to the said Captain Jones, from the time of his appointment to the command of the said squadron; also, copies of all communications received from him relating to his expedition for the occupation of the Californias; and, also, to inform this House whether orders have been despatched to the said Captain Jones, recalling him from his command.

Mr. GRANGER moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE hoped the gentleman from New York would withdraw his motion, to enable him to make a statement. He had a statement in his hand from Commodore Jones himself.

Mr. GRANGER suggested to the gentleman from Virginia that he might send that statement to the chair, and have it read by the Clerk.

Mr. WISE said he would not let it go out of his hands, unless the gentleman from New York would withdraw the motion for the previous question.

Mr. GRANGER did not accede to the proposition.

The previous question was then seconded—93 voting in the affirmative, and 70 in the negative.

Mr. WISE now called for the orders of the day —the morning hour having expired.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

The Territorial business being the special order for this day,

Mr. LEVY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole thereon; which was agreed to, and Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL was called to the chair.

On the motion of Mr. DODGE of Wisconsin, the committee took up a bill to authorize the election and appointment of officers of the Territory of Wisconsin; which, on his motion, was amended, and laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. DODGE of Wisconsin then moved that the committee take up the bill for the protection of commerce on the western shore of Lake Michigan.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON suggested some immaterial amendment; which was agreed to.

Mr. MERIWETHER asked what the amount was, which this bill proposed to appropriate.

The Clerk was understood to reply that it was $83,000.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY advocated the bill, which was intended to appropriate money for the construction of harbors, which the commerce of the lakes so much required.

Mr. MERIWETHER contended that this appropriation should have formed part of the general appropriation bill. He was opposed to this division of the appropriations.

Mr. BLACK also opposed the bill. He said he did not do so on the ground of the extravagance of its appropriation. He would not stop to inquire into the amount appropriated in the bill. He looked to a higher question involved in this bill. He looked to the question as to the right of the Federal Government to carry on internal improvements. He had always opposed such improvements by the General Government, wherever the improvement might lie—whether in his own State or elsewhere. He regarded opposition to internal improvements by the Federal Government as one of the most substantial tenets of the Republican faith.

Mr. POPE rose, and advocated the bill. He did not regard this as a constitutional question, but merely as one of expediency. He replied to various objections urged against the bill.

Mr. ROOSEVELT rose to make a single inquiry. How much would it cost to complete the several harbors, since what was proposed to be appropriated in this bill was only a beginning? [A voice: "Less than the New York custom-house."]

Mr. H. DODGE stated that an estimate had been made by the Topographical bureau of the whole cost of the several harbors, and the amount was $171,000. He then proceeded to address the committee in favor of the bill. Unwilling as he was to obtrude himself upon the House, (knowing the delicate relation in which delegates from the Territories stood, and also knowing the importance of the time of the House,) he should say but little on the subject. It was, indeed, true that but little time was given to the business of the Territories on yesterday; when the army bill was passed, it wanted a quarter of 2 o'clock; and when the House adjourned, it was a quarter past 3. Thus, only one hour and a half was given to the Territories on that day; and yet to-day the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT] again manifested a disposition to lay the heavy hand of power upon us!

He proceeded to reply to various objections urged against the appropriations. The estimates for the harbors were made five years ago; and since that time, the memorials of the Legislature of Wisconsin had been continually presented to Congress. Numerous memorials had also come here from Ohio, New York, Indiana, and Illinois—all asking the same object. It was a matter of vital importance; and though some gentlemen here might think lightly of everything that concerned the Territories, he trusted it would be viewed in the proper light, and that justice would be done.

It had been asked why this bill was without a report. He would answer, that early in the session he consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. J. P. KENNEDY,] and that gentleman thought it was best to report a bill identical with the bill of last session. The estimates for the completion of these harbors were made in 1837, and their aggregate was $228 000; since that time, the price of lumber, of provisions, and of labor had fallen. Plank, which then cost $50, could now be bought for $15. So with other things which would be used. The actual expense, then, of the whole three harbors, he thought could not exceed $171,000.

As to the constitutional objection to the appropriations, he would say that objections of this kind, however applicable to appropriations for internal improvements in the States, could not apply to the Territories. The Territories were the property of the National Government; and all they asked was that justice might be done. Already had the Territory of Wisconsin paid into the treasury near $3,000,000 from sales of public lands within it. The mere pittance of 2½ per cent. upon the revenue there collected, would complete the harbors asked for. They were important to the Territory and to its increasing exports. The Secretary of War had called attention to their importance in a national point of view. (Here Mr. D. read from the report of the Secretary of War.) In case of a war with England, what, he asked, would be our condition? Where could our troops be landed in that section of the country?—settled by a hardy, enterprising and intelligent population, which would be soon sufficient for it to become a State. Its improvement was important to the Atlantic States. He referred to the risk of life at present incurred by all who navigate the lakes—life which was above all price. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MERIWETHER] he thought, would not have been so ardent in his opposition to the bill, had he been in some of the storms last November upon the lakes, where the people of Wisconsin were liable to be wrecked on their own shores. He described the storms which often arose on the lakes, and the dangers which the people had to encounter. They had risked everything in making their settlements. Should they, then, be only regarded as step-children, thrown aside, and their interests not attended to?

He availed himself of the occasion to do justice to several gentlemen now on that floor, who had enlisted in behalf of Wisconsin, when their services were so effective in defending her territory from devastation—Messrs. REYNOLDS, CASEY, and STUART of Illinois. It was due to those gentlemen to say that they had continued to be friendly to his people.

After referring to the fact that the Committee of Ways and Means had reported a bill appropriating $60,000 for the harbor of Chicago, and $642,000 for harbors generally, he begged that his Territory might not be thrown off, whilst other parts of the Union were so well provided for. All that his constituents wanted was aid to enable them to develop the resources of their section of the country.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON observed that the bill would meet his approbation, provided one amendment should be made. The clause for a harbor at Milwaukie provided that the harbor should be constructed at the mouth of the river. Now, as he understood that there was a much better location, where nature had almost formed a harbor, he moved to amend the bill, by providing that the location of the harbor should be selected under the direction of the Secretary of War; thus leaving the question open.

Mr. H. DODGE acquiesced in the suggestion.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY said, as the fiscal year had been changed, he wished to have the bill so amended, to distribute the appropriations accordingly—directing a portion to be expended during the half-calendar year ending June 30, 1843, and the remainder during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1844. He wished to have the several sums divided accordingly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill (no further propositions to amend having been submitted) was then laid aside to be reported.

Mr. LEVY moved to take up the bill making appropriations for certain roads and the improvement of certain rivers in the Territory of Florida; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN offered an amendment to strike out the Escambia river, and insert the Choctahatchie, so as to make the appropriation for the improvement of the latter river instead of the former: carried.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to strike out the appropriation of $12,000 for the road commencing on the Apalachicola, and suggested the inexpediency of making such large appropriations for objects that could be dispensed with in the present state of our finances.

Mr. LEVY explained, and defended the appropriation; and the vote being taken,

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON was rejected, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

On motion by Mr. LEVY, the committee took up the bill making appropriations for the completion of the public buildings in the Territory of Florida; and, after some explanations by Mr. L., it was also laid aside to be reported.

On motion by Mr. LEVY, the bill making an appropriation of $5,000 for a law library for the Territory of Florida, was taken up.

Mr. ROOSEVELT briefly opposed the bill; and After some remarks from Messrs. BLACK, PROFFIT, and LEVY, the question was taken on reporting the bill to the House; and it was lost.

On motion by Mr. LEVY, the bill making an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at Key West, was taken up.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. LEVY made some remarks, explaining and advocating the bill, and in opposition to the motion.

Tellers were demanded on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CAVE JOHNSON] to strike out the enacting clause; and Messrs. R. W. THOMPSON and HOUSTON were appointed; and they reported 45 in the affirmative, and 68 in the negative—being less than a quorum.

A motion was made that the committee rise; which was negatived—ayes 58, noes 64. As this division proved that a quorum was in attendance, the committee returned to the consideration of the motion of Mr. C. JOHNSON to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. JOHNSON withdrew his motion, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. DODGE of Iowa moved to take up bill No. 388, entitled "A bill for the construction of certain roads and a canal route in the Territory of Iowa;" which motion was agreed to.

Mr. D. then moved the following amendment, to be inserted in lieu of the bill as it now stands:

That the sum of fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to continue the removal of the obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi river, at the Des Moines and Rock River rapids, in said river, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War during that portion of the year 1843 when most good can be effected by the same.

This object Mr. D. advocated, and supported his advocacy by reading extracts from certain memorials from the Territories, and from a message of Governor Chambers to the Territorial Legislature at its last session.

The debate was continued by Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, Mr. DODGE of Iowa, and Mr. SPRIGG.

Mr. POPE advocated the appropriation as contemplated for a useful object. The trade was very important; and it would be needless to endeavor to arrest these expenditures. They would be made; for the removal of the obstructions in the Western rivers had been commenced, and the continuance of it was only like repairing a road. He regretted the low state of the treasury; yet the fault he attributed to others—to the striking out of tea and coffee, as dutiable articles, from the tariff bill, by the Senate.

Various gentlemen expressed a desire to speak; but

Mr. C. JOHNSON moved that the committee rise; which motion was carried.

The committee then rose, and reported the several bills noticed as laid aside to be reported.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to amend the act of 1838, granting pre-emption rights to certain settlers: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. POPE, from the Committee on Territories, reported "A bill concerning the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin:" read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER, at the suggestion of Mr. FILLMORE, laid before the House a confidential communication in relation to certain frauds alleged to have been committed upon the Cherokee tribe of Indians. The message (without being opened or read) was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, in answer to a resolution calling for information in relation to the repair of the Potomac bridge: referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with the 30th section of the act of 1836, a detailed statement of the condition of the Chickasaw fund: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Navy Department, in answer to a resolution calling for information in relation to the pay of seamen and others: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRIGGS submitted a motion to print 5,000 extra copies; which was objected to, and lies over.

Mr. GRAHAM offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying John Phagan for services he rendered the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in Florida, among the Seminole Indians.

On motion of Mr. WELLER, the House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with the third section of the act of 30th April, 1836, an exhibit of the condition of the several trust funds arising out of the treaties with the Choctaw Indians; which, on motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana—one relating to the construction of a harbor at Michigan city; and another asking an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Wabash river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BATES presented two petitions from Ipswich, Massachusetts—one signed by Daniel Weed and 26 others, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and the other, signed by W. W. Graves and 25 others, for the abolition of slavery generally.

Objection was made to their reception; and,

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the question of reception was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALKER presented memorials from the city council and citizens of Natchez, Mississippi, praying the establishment of a naval armory and dock-yard at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CHOATE presented petitions from Isaac Hall and Thomas Curtis, merchants of Boston, praying the payment of a sum of money retained by the United States consul in the Isle of France—being part of the proceeds of a vessel owned by them, which was condemned and sold as unseaworthy: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONRAD presented a petition from F. Denon and others, purchasers of public lands in Louisiana, praying that patents may be issued to them for other lands in lieu of those entered, which proved to be within the limits of previous grants; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that $200,000,000 of stock, founded on the public domain, may be issued by the Government to the States and Territories, in a representative ratio; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. S. also presented a memorial, signed by 750 ladies of Philadelphia, (and, to judge from their signatures, very delicate and fair ladies,) praying that Congress may exercise their constitutional right, and abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BERRIEN objected to its reception; and, on motion, the question of reception was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Secretary of the Senate the petition of Elisha Bentley for a pension.

On motion by Mr. LINN, the documents on the files of the Senate relating to the proposition to purchase the patent of Captain Shreeve for his snag boat, were ordered to be taken therefrom, and referred to the Committee on Patents having charge of the bill for that purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, the bill from the House for the relief of Andrew Fisher, and the bill for the relief of William W. Street.

Mr. MERRICK presented a memorial from the board of trade of the city of Baltimore, on the subject of the depressed state of the shipping interest, which the memorialists attribute to the want of reciprocity in our treaty stipulations with foreign powers, and ask legislation on the subject: referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Wynn, and it was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. CONRAD, the petition and documents of Charles Dehault Delassus were ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PORTER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill making further appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. P. also, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of Robert B. Lewis; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the following bills; which were read, and ordered to a second reading, viz:

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Wm. Fisher; and

A bill granting a tract of land to Villeneuve Leblanc, in consideration of the benefit derived to the public lands from his services in damming the mouth of False river.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the report of the Secretary of the Navy on the subject of the payment of naval pensions since the 16th of August, 1841, reported a bill respecting the payment of invalid pensions to officers of the naval and marine service of the United States; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting the annual statement of the appropriations in that department for the service of the year 1842—showing the balance of appropriations on the 1st of January, 1842, the repayments and transfers in 1842, the amount applicable to the service of 1842, &c., &c.; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the House making appropriations for the support of the army and military academy for 1843 and 1844, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate then proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday, being the bill to prevent the employment of private expresses upon mail routes, and for the prevention of frauds upon the revenues of the Post Office Department—the question pending being the amendment proposed by Mr PORTER, to strike out of the second and fifth sections the words "or other mailable matter whatever;" the effect of which proposition would be, if adopted, to permit all matter, except letters, to be conveyed by private expresses.

Mr. MERRICK expressed the hope that the Senate would not consent to adopt the amendment, because, if it was adopted, the good anticipated from the measure would be defeated. It was important that it should be retained, in order that the department may collect and receive all the revenues to which it was entitled, in consequence of the expense which it is compelled to incur in making preparations to carry such matter as is by law chargeable with postage. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PORTER] seemed to think on yesterday, that it was unimportant to the department to have a monopoly of carrying newspapers and pamphlets in the mails. He (Mr. M.) admitted that it would be unimportant if the department was not compelled to incur the expense for carrying them.

He had, since yesterday, made an inquiry of the Post Office Department as to the amount of revenue derivable from these sources. He had been informed that a communication had been just received from New York by the Postmaster General upon this very subject. The communication was from an authentic source, and gave statistics as to the effect upon the revenues of the department, by permitting the privileges exercised by those private expresses, of conveying, by railroads and steamboats, matter which properly belonged to the mails. The Senate might be enabled to see the loss on newspaper postage alone, from the fact, as stated in that communication, that 28,000 newspaper sheets were sent to New York daily, outside of the mail; the postage on which, if transmitted through the mail, would cost about $320 per day, or $99,850 per year. That was the amount of which the department was deprived, at that point, of newspaper postage only, by the facility which was permitted these private expresses on the regular mail routes. If they allowed these persons thus to appropriate that enormous sum of money, which rightly belonged to the department, to their private uses, and, at the same time, compel the department to incur the expense of carrying the mail, it would soon be found that the Government would have to sustain that department out of the common treasury, and tax the people therefor.

Mr. M. said that the same evils exist to the same extent in other cities of the United States, as in the city of New York, in proportion to the extent of their commerce and population. If, therefore, it was desirable to preserve to the people the comforts, convenience, and advantages which were offered by the mails of the United States, without, at this unpropitious time, letting that department fall a burden on the common treasury, those evils should be speedily modified or removed. The Postmaster General had informed him that he made a contract with a certain railroad company for transporting the mails between the cities of Baltimore and Philadelphia, for which he pays the annual sum of $20,000; and in a week after the contract was entered into, that company put on their line another car for the transportation of the express, carrying matter which properly belonged to the United States mail, which they had contracted to carry: thus receiving double pay for carrying the same matter—that is, $20,000 for the department, and probably some $20,000 or $30,000 for the extra car; and enabling those private individuals to come into competition with the Government, and by fraud to pocket the postage which belonged the department. This flagrant outrage on the rights of the department was practised within two hours ride of that Capitol.

He had no doubt that the loss to the department of postage on newspapers alone, by those private expresses—which were now established, or being established between all the commercial cities in the Union, and most profitable routes—would amount to $300,000 annually. The department would have to come to a dead halt, unless Congress interpose, and legislate effectually and efficiently to guard the revenues of the department.

He then replied to the complaints of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] that, by the provisions of this bill, packages of money and bills of exchange belonging to the merchants would be liable to postage; remarking that the Post Office Department was established principally for the benefit of the commercial community, and if they conspired to break through these arrangements, (as had been intimated,) and, consequently, to break down the department, why, then, it would have to fall. If they were not willing to pay for the mail facilities granted to them, the department could not be carried on at all. He maintained that it was expedient and necessary that the commercial interest should contribute in fair proportion to support the department, by paying for their packages of money and bills of exchange, if they were transmitted by mail. They, however, had the privilege of sending packages of money by private individuals, or by special express, if they thought proper to do so at their own expense; but could not send them by those regular express lines. With a view to accommodate the bill as far as possible to the suggestions of Senators, and to define, in specific terms, what was mailable matter, he moved the following amendment, to come in as an additional section to the bill, viz:

And be it further enacted, That all "mailable matter," and matter properly transmissible by mail, shall be deemed and taken to mean all letters and newspapers, and all magazines or pamphlets periodically published, and all written and printed matter whereof each copy or edition shall not exceed one pound in weight; but bound books of any size shall not be held to be included within the meaning of this term; and any packet or packets, of whatever size, being made up of any such mailable matter, shall subject all persons concerned in transporting the same to all the penalties of this law, equally as if it or they had not been made up into packets or packages.

Mr. HUNTINGTON thought that Senators would all agree in one thing—that it was necessary and proper to put an end, in some form, to these private expresses. Unless this was done, the revenues from postage would not sustain the Post Office Department; and the Government would be obliged to sustain it at the expense of the common treasury. In the suggestions he made on yesterday, concerning the transmission of packages of money by the mercantile class, he did not wish to be understood as desiring that that class should be specially protected in this bill. He then went on to argue that the merchants should not be compelled to risk their money, bills of exchange, and other valuable evidences of debt, through the mail; but ought to be permitted to transmit them in a more secure and cheap manner, if these facilities were afforded by those private expresses. If the commercial community were compelled to place such packages in the mail, they would be taxed much heavier than they were now taxed. He then went on to argue that the provisions of the bill to suppress the transmission of papers out of the mail could not be enforced; that some means would be invented to evade them; and that it would be useless to attempt to enforce them.

Mr. MERRICK replied, expressing the opinion that if the bill was passed, it would save to the department, in the course of a year, at least $1,000,000; and afford means to extend greater facilities to distant and sparsely populated portions of the Union, and also to reduce the rates of postage on letters. He concluded by moving that the amendment be printed; which was agreed to.

The bill was then passed by informally; the time for proceeding to the orders of the day having arrived.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The special order brought up the unfinished debate on the question of passing the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory—the motion pending being that of recommitting the bill to a select committee.

Mr. BENTON, who was entitled to the floor from yesterday evening, addressed the Senate for upwards of two hours in support of the bill in its present form.

There was one point on which every Senator who had yet spoken concurred—that the title to the Territory was in the United States. The land being our property, we have an unquestionable right to make whatever use of it we desire. It is enough for us to know we are right, for us to do whatever we think it is our best interest to do with our own property. Nobody has a right to be offended at this. If any other power takes offence at what we propose to do with our own property, that should be no reason why we should not do it. The same arguments used on this occasion to tie up our hands from doing anything lest it might provoke a collision with another power, had been pushed quite as far when General Jackson determined to insist upon our rights from France. Yet, because Gen. Jackson was right, he persisted; and the result was contrary to the predictions of the timid—we obtained our right, and there was no collision. Were we now to pursue the same course, we would maintain our right too, and there would be no collision. But even if there should be war in consequence of our doing what we have an unquestionable right to do with our own property: that should not stop us. We know we are right, and we leave the consequences of maintaining our right in the hands of Him who sides with justice.

It had been said that we should leave our cause to time—that time was our best negotiator. What had we ever gained by time? What had we ever gained by negotiation? In every instance that either had been tried between us and Great Britain, she had come off the gainer, and we the loser. It had been so with regard to the Oregon Territory: it had been so with regard to the Northeastern boundary. At first, all that England asked in relation to the Northeastern boundary, was a variation of the line, so as to give her a right of way at all seasons between Quebec and Halifax. When we would not agree to that, she offered to purchase as much territory as she wanted. That offer being rejected, her pretensions began to take root, and she had cultivated them so assiduously ever since, that at last she placed herself in a position to acquire more than ten times as much as she at first asked. And in the treaty of 1842, our Secretary-negotiator gave her everything she desired. So with the Northwestern boundary line between the Lake of the Woods and Lake Superior: she began by asking a revision of the line. Our negotiators were so astonished at even this boldness, that they had to ask the British minister to repeat the request, thinking there must be some mistake. But there was none, though the demand was made in the gentle language of a request that there might be a revision of the line. It was refused; but on that very request grew up her pretensions, till, in the Webster treaty of 1842, our Secretary-negotiator gave her everything she demanded; brought her back fifty miles from the post to which she had retreated on her own territory in 1802, to get off our territory, and to avoid paying us duty on her goods passing through our country. After having voluntarily abandoned their position on our territory at Grand Portage, and gone fifty miles to the north, they are brought back, and allowed the joint occupancy of the Portage route in our territory, free of all duties, and forever. And we are told this treaty brings within the United States four millions of fine mineral lands—as if we made that gain by it. To be sure, those four millions of acres were within our territory, because they were always within it—they never had been beyond it. They were ours before the treaty, as well as after it. England knew that, and had fled from the emporium of the northwest—the Constantinople of that region—to a position 50 miles north, where she was sure of not being on our soil. What she had been denied by every treaty, by every negotiation, and by every ministry of the United States, from the Revolution to the time of the present Administration, she had been granted by our Secretary-negotiator in 1842. What power, what authority had he to do what all other American negotiators had uniformly declared they had neither power nor authority for doing?

He wanted to see the power and the authority for altering the boundaries of the United States, to the entire advantage of a foreign power, and to the disadvantage and irreparable loss of the United States. He wanted to see the power and authority for giving these advantages to a foreign power—and particularly to the British Government, whose chief object in such acquisitions was to prepare herself for war. These demands of hers were the progeny of the last war. She then found out what an invaluable acquisition to her would be a safe road from Quebec to Halifax. She found out how valuable to her, in a warfare against us, were the services of her allies, the Indian bloodhounds on our Northwestern frontier. That war had cost us one hundred and twenty millions of dollars. It took but sixty millions of this to maintain ourselves against the whole power of Britain, by sea and land, except on the Northwestern frontier; and there alone it cost us another sixty millions. Her Hudson Bay Company, with its 1,200 men and its Indian bloodhounds, was another Great Britain, which it cost us as much to resist as the naval and military forces of the empire of Great Britain itself. And by our late treaty, she had been secured in all those positions. She had been made strong to assail, and we weak to repel. She had gained everything; we lost everything.

Such has always been the result of time, delay, and negotiation with Great Britain. Such would be the consequence of time and negotiation in the settlement of the question of the Oregon Territory. Some Senator had calculated the distance by sea between us and the mouth of the Columbia river at eighteen thousand miles. Twenty years ago he had calculated it at twenty thousand from Boston to the Columbia, and he then made use of the calculation as an argument of the strongest kind to show the importance of the harbor at the mouth of that river for our commercial and military marine in the Pacific—cut off, as they were, by a sea of twenty thousand miles in extent, from shelter or retreat on their own soil—and that harbor theirs, but unprepared for their use. The distance was the strongest argument in favor of its being made a naval depot and fortification. Gentlemen also talked of the distance by land being 3,000 miles, and the expense of carrying out this bill $100,000. But they voted for the late treaty, by which Great Britain compels us to keep 80 guns afloat on the coast of Africa, at a cost of six hundred thousand dollars a year; and for what? To recapture negroes. And when we have them, what are we to do with them? Not to bring them to the United States, surely. We have no islands, like the West India islands, for taking apprentices at 40 years of age to work for our interests. But we are to colonize Liberia, where we have not a foot of territory. We are not to do anything with our own territory of Oregon; but we are to colonize Liberia at an expense of five millions in five years! He would next year call for information as to the number of negroes our African fleet shall have recaptured; and he was pretty sure that by dividing the number into $600,000, it would be found that the colonization of Liberia by African negroes would cost us more per head than the 640 acres apiece to each of our citizens choosing to settle in the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. CHOATE said there was one point on which the Senator from Missouri had touched, which he wished to make a few observations upon in reply. He meant that relating to the Northwest boundary line from the Lake of the Woods to Lake Superior. It would be necessary, however, to refer to documents not then at hand. He would therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate to pass the bill over informally.

The bill was accordingly passed over informally.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution authorizing the investment of the naval hospital fund; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the system of revenue cutters, and of employing a part of the navy of the United States in that service.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a petition from John Sarchet, of Philadelphia, praying Congress to modify the tariff so as to bring it down to a revenue standard. The petition (said Mr. C.) contained much valuable information as to the effect of the present tariff; and he moved that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Ordnance Bureau, showing the management and condition of that department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1843.

Mr. BRIGGS, on leave, laid on the table an amendment to the bill reported some days since by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reducing the postage on letters carried by mail: ordered to be printed.

Mr. DODGE of Iowa moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the business relating to the Territories. He stated that so much of the time which was under the special order to be devoted to Territorial business had been occupied in attending to that of the nation, that he trusted the House would, as an act of sheer justice, adopt his motion, and proceed at once, without the consumption of the morning hour, to the execution of the special order.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL wished, before taking the question on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the House would take up and assign a special day for the consideration of the bill suspending for a limited time the operation of the districting law of the last session. That bill had been referred to the Committee of the Whole, in the vortex of which he feared it would be lost, considering the short time that yet remained of the session, unless some special day was assigned for its consideration. He would suggest that it be made the special order for Thursday next.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON hoped the House would make no more special orders. They were already considerably embarrassed by the number they had made.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL said that he was surprised at the objections of the gentleman from Tennessee, considering the opposition he made to the bill, the rigor of which it was proposed to relax.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman from South Carolina that Thursday was already assigned for some other business.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL said he would then propose Monday next.

Mr. TURNEY said he would remind the House that the Committee of Elections had reported against this bill, and that the question would arise on that report.

The SPEAKER said that the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to go into Committee of the Whole was yet undisposed of.

Mr. ADAMS said that the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to go into Committee of the Whole was not in order, and could not take precedence over the other business of the House. True, a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would be in order; but the Territorial business was not in that committee, but in the ordinary Committee of the Whole.

The resolution, therefore, that he moved yesterday, in relation to the capture of Monterey by Commodore Jones, was first in order; and on that the previous question had been seconded.

Mr. POPE observed that two of the three days allotted to Territorial business had passed over, and only three or four hours had been devoted to that business. He hoped that, in consideration of that fact, the House would go into Committee of the Whole on that business for the remainder of the day; and he had no doubt, if they did so, but that they would finish it.

The SPEAKER said that the question did not admit of debate, and directed the Clerk to read the resolution; which was done, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House by what authority, and under whose instructions, Captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, commander of the squadron of the United States in the Pacific ocean, did, on or about the 19th of October last, invade in warlike array the territory of the Mexican Republic, take possession of the town of Monterey, and declare himself commander of the naval and military expedition for the occupation of the Californias.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House copies of all the instructions given by him, or under his authority, to the said Captain Jones, from the time of his appointment to the command of the said squadron; also, copies of all communications received from him relating to his expedition for the occupation of the Californias; and also to inform this House whether orders have been despatched to the said Captain Jones, recalling him from his command.

The question was put on ordering the main question, and carried.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

Mr. CUSHING asked to be excused from voting on the resolution. His reason was this: He should be glad to vote for the resolution, and saw no reason why it should not pass the House. He knew nothing in regard to it that the Administration should conceal; and he was, therefore, unwilling to vote against it. But he could not vote for it, because it excluded the usual condition in resolutions of this nature—that the communication of the information called for should not, in the judgment of the President, be incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. WISE also asked to be excused from voting. His reason was this: He had information in his possession from Commodore Jones himself, and therefore knew the fact that there was no necessity for adopting the resolution. Commodore Jones informed him that, without any orders from the Government at all, but from a report which he had no reason to doubt, as well as from information received from a United States consul in South America, that there was actual war between the United States and Mexico, together with the suspicious movements of the British fleet, inducing him to believe that they were about to take possession of the Californias, he captured Monterey. As soon as information reached him that war did not exist, he restored Monterey to the Mexican authorities; and he also informed Mr. W. that his relations with them were better than they ever were before.

Mr. BRIGGS called Mr. WISE to order.

Mr. WISE said, that it was to him the strangest thing in the world, that, with positive information from Commodore Jones himself, ready to be given to them, gentlemen were determined to vote blindfold in this matter. The Administration had nothing to do with the affair.

Mr. GRANGER rose and addressed the chair; but gave way to

Mr. WISE, who withdrew his request to be excused.

Mr. GRANGER again rose and said: A single remark why I wish to be excused. If the Administration is, as I doubt not, so entirely blameless in this matter, the gentleman from Virginia, I suppose, and the other friends of the Administration, would desire to be placed right. [Cries of "order, order."]

Mr. BRIGGS rose to a question of order, on the ground that the gentleman from New York was debating the merits of the question.

Mr. GRANGER. I am not debating the question, sir.

Mr. WISE said, as he was interrupted, he hoped other gentlemen would be required to conform to the same rule; or that he should have the right to reply.

Mr. GRANGER. I will take my seat—I think I have said enough.

Mr. WISE. Yes, you have.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and resulted thus—yeas 118, nays 69; so the resolution was adopted:

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The next question in order was the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] who, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, yesterday made the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Ebenezer Wheelwright, and others, praying indemnity from the United States for French spoliations prior to 1800, report the following resolution for the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, on House bill No. 57, entitled "A bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens, for spoliations committed on their commerce prior to 31st July, 1801," shall cease on Tuesday next, at 2 o'clock, and the committee shall proceed to vote on the amendments then pending, or that may be offered to said bill, and then report the bill to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

On this resolution, the House yesterday seconded the motion for the previous question, but negatived the question "Shall the main question be now put?" on which the question now recurred.

Mr. BOYD moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CUSHING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and resulted thus—yeas 94, nays 104. So the motion to lie on the table was negatived.

The question again recurred, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked for the yeas and nays, which were taken, and resulted—yeas 94, nays 100.

So the House determined that the main question should not be now put.

The SPEAKER then announced that the morning hour had expired.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

The special order was resumed.

The bills reported from the Committee of the Whole were taken up, with a view to their engrossment; but, at the suggestion of Mr. POPE, they were laid aside for the present.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL in the chair.)

The bill making an appropriation for certain roads, and the survey of certain canal routes, in the Territory of Iowa, was first taken up—the question being on the amendment of Mr. A. C. DODGE, to apply $50,000 of the appropriation to the removal of the obstructions in the Mississippi river at the rapids of the Des Moines.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON spoke briefly in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. REYNOLDS replied, arguing in favor of the great benefit to be derived from the proposed improvements, and contending that the opening of this great national highway was not a mere local measure, but alike interesting to all the States of the Union.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi did not rise to make a speech, but to urge upon the committee to pass on this bill without further discussion. At the last session of Congress, the days set apart for Territorial business were principally consumed in the examination of general questions, without coming to any decisive result; and he feared that this day would be taken up in the same manner if they allowed a discussion to go on, on the constitutional powers of the Government. He hoped that the committee would, without further debate, settle this question—a question which he considered to be one of mere expedience only—viz., whether they should appropriate this $50,000 to roads and improvements in the Territory of Iowa, or to the opening and improvement of the Mississippi river, the great highway of the Union.

Mr. BARNARD opposed the amendment, on the ground that the improvement of the Mississippi was not Territorial business, and that legislation in regard to it in this way gave it a preference over other rivers of the United States equally deserving of the favor of the Government. He was willing to give the $50,000, or $100,000, if necessary, for the improvement of the Mississippi river; but at the same time he wanted to start fair—he wanted the Hudson river to have an equal share. There was a bill on the table making an appropriation for the improvement of several rivers of the United States, including the Mississippi as well as the Hudson, and he wished gentlemen to wait till that bill came up.

Here was an appropriation of $50,000 for clearing out the obstructions of the Des Moines and Rock River rapids, and gentlemen talked of its importance; but he would ask them to tell him the amount of merchandise which passed over the Des Moines rapids? Was it $5,000,000 per annum? Was it $10,000,000? He would go for those improvements at the proper time; but he should ask gentlemen, at the same time, to give him a little for the North River; and $60,000,000 of merchandise every year passed the spot where they proposed to make improvements in that river, besides one million of passengers. Now, he made these remarks to show gentlemen that there were other important points which required their attention as well as the rivers in question. He did not like this way of getting at the improvement of the Western rivers, while others, quite as important, were left unnoticed. Let them wait until they got a report from a proper committee, and then he would go as far as any gentleman of this House—at least as far as they ought to go, considering the state of the national treasury. He would, if it were necessary, go the whole length of the river, extending 3,000 miles, when the state of the treasury would permit; but, at present, he would recommend that they should wait. He was against this amendment; but he would go for the original bill.

Mr. BLACK, in the course of some observations, expressed his disappointment on hearing the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. REYNOLDS;] for that gentleman had promised to make some remarks on the constitutionality of this bill, but he had done nothing more than cite precedents to justify it. He then called that gentleman's attention to the Maysville road bill, which was vetoed by the political chief of the gentleman from Illinois—General Jackson—as a precedent of a contrary tendency.

Mr. WARD said he thought the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] was a correct one; and he hoped the Delegate from Iowa would withdraw his amendment; and when it came into the House in another form, he (Mr. WARD) would give it his support.

Mr. DODGE of Iowa said he saw the time of the House would be lost on this proposition, and the other Territorial business would not, consequently, have proper consideration, and therefore he withdrew his amendment.

The question then recurred on the bill in its original form.

Mr. ROOSEVELT said the motion of the Delegate, which was just withdrawn, to strike out every section of the original bill, and substitute for it a different proposition, was an admission by the Delegate that this appropriation was uncalled for, or at least could be dispensed with. He did not intend to be unkind to the Territories, but he wished to be kind to the credit of the country. They had been going on too fast; and now they found that if they were to have any money, they must borrow it. He hoped some regard would be paid to the state of the treasury; and he would beg gentlemen to remember that even borrowed money was to be repaid. He hoped this body, at least, whatever others might do, would hold to the doctrine that every engagement into which the Government might enter was to be honestly and punctually discharged.

But what was the prospect for the treasury? Why, so far as appeared by a document before them, the revenue for 1843 would not exceed $12,000,000. He disapproved, then, of the commencement of new works, which might end in expenditures they knew not how great, and last they knew not how long. The custom-houses of both New York and Boston afforded examples for their admonition, and showed the necessity of strictly guarding at the outset against improper appropriations.

By a statement published in the Madisonian of this morning, it appeared that there were outstanding treasury notes amounting to $11,731,327 69; and if to this were added the amount of loans, they had an existing debt exceeding $25,000,000. This was a fact which spoke so loudly for itself, that he would abstain from further observation.

Mr. WELLER, in the course of some observations, was understood to say that if this bill had proposed to make appropriations for Northern custom-houses or rivers, or Southern harbors, they would have heard nothing there of the embarrassed state of the treasury, or of constitutional objections. He rejoiced, however, that in the next Congress the West would be more equitably represented, and then she would do justice to herself. He defended the Delegate from Iowa from the unwarranted interpretation which the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT] had given to his motion; adding that the Delegate had expressly adopted such a course as promised the greatest amount of good.

Mr. McKENNAN briefly advocated the appropriation proposed to be made by this bill; and then moved that it be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose to renew the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. A. C. DODGE.] He advocated the propriety of the appropriation, and condented that it would open the avenues to the Territory, and thereby give it an influx of population.

The question was taken on the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, (appropriating $50,000 to the removal of obstructions in the Mississippi river at Des Moines rapids,) and the Chair reported 51 in the affirmative.

Tellers were ordered, (to see if a quorum was present,) and they reported ayes 77, noes 39.

So there was no quorum voting.

Mr. MERIWETHER demanded that the fact be reported to the House.

The CHAIRMAN said he was informed that there was a quorum in the hall, and ordered the tellers to take the vote again.

The tellers reported 97 in the affirmative, being evidently a majority.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported.

On motion of Mr. H. DODGE, the committee took up "a bill concerning the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin."

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON wished to hear some reason for the appropriation contained in this bill.

Mr. POPE explained that it was necessary, in order to enable the Legislative Assembly to meet. There was now no appropriation, and the Governor refused to co-operate with them until an appropriation should be made, and their meeting legalized.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the bill. He thought it had not been reported with due consideration. He wished the committee to consider well before they decided whether the Governor or the Legislature of Wisconsin was right.

Mr. POPE explained the bill. The Legislative Assembly supposed they had assembled "according to law;" and, therefore, those words were inserted in the bill. At his suggestion, they were stricken out, so as to leave it an open question whether the Assembly met, according to law, in December.

Mr. WARREN wished to know why it was necessary for the Legislature to sit 50 days.

Mr. POPE explained. According to law, the Territorial Legislatures were allowed to sit 75 days. But, in consequence of the expenses which had to be incurred, in the shape of mileage, &c., at the meeting of the Legislative Assembly in December, the committee thought proper to limit the session to be held to 50 days.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS referred to the law passed at a former session of Congress, and asked if it did not prohibit sessions of Territorial Assemblies from being held without an express appropriation being first made.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the reading of the law.

Mr. DEAN explained the organic law of the Territory of Wisconsin on this subject. That required that there should be a meeting of the Legislative Assembly on the first Monday in December of every year. When the Governor refused to meet them, on the ground that there was no appropriation, they adjourned. Now, the object of this bill was to pay them for their meeting on this occasion, according to the law of the Territory. Important business required their early meeting; and he hoped the bill would be passed.

Mr. BRIGGS wished to hear the facts. At the last session of Congress, a law was passed, which provided that no session of a Territorial Assembly should be held, unless an appropriation had previously been made. [Several members: "An appropriation was made."] Now, he wished to know whether the appropriation was made for the meeting in December last.

Mr. H. DODGE said an appropriation was made in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill of 1842.

The Clerk read a clause from that bill, which appropriated $20,000 for the pay and mileage of the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin.

Mr. BRIGGS wished to be informed whether the appropriation was for services past or prospective.

Mr. H. DODGE explained. That appropriation was for the Legislative Assembly of 1842, but was misapplied by the Secretary of the Territory, and applied to the payment of arrearages and old debts of the Territory. That officer contended that he had ample reasons to justify him in so doing. If, then, the Secretary misapplied the funds for the payment of the Legislative Assembly, it was not their fault.

Mr. D. pressed upon the committee the necessity of passing this bill. There was now no legislature, and none could be assembled until the bill was passed. Everything was now in the hands of the Governor. All appointments were made by him, without check or control from any body of counsellors.

Mr. BRIGGS said that he was not precisely relieved from his difficulties. If he understood the gentleman, he said that the money was appropriated for one purpose, but that the Governor applied it to another.

Mr. FILLMORE, without intending to enter into the present controversy, begged leave to make an explanation. At the last session of Congress, an appropriation was made for this Territory, for the year 1842. In recommending the appropriations, however, the Committee of Ways and Means found claims for very large arrearages, which they refused to allow; and they only recommended the amount of appropriation that had been made the year before. When the bill came up in the House, a motion was made to insert an appropriation for arrearages, which was rejected. The bill then went to the Senate; and finally, for the purpose of avoiding these arrearages in future, a section was inserted, providing that, hereafter, no sessions of the Territorial Legislatures shall be held without an appropriation from Congress to pay them.

This was the state of the case, so far as the Committee of Ways and Means was concerned. He did not see how it applied to the present question.

Mr. ADAMS moved to strike out the provision for mileage and per diem for the members of the Legislature of Iowa, who met on the first Monday of December last, and whom the Governor refused to communicate with, on the ground that there was no appropriation to pay them.

Mr. MORGAN read a communication from Governor Doty and the Secretary of State, to show that the session of the Legislature was illegal, and that there was no money to pay them. Mr. M. went on to argue that this fact was known to the members of the Legislature.

Mr. POPE said that no appropriation was asked in this bill—the appropriation having been already made at the last session; and all that was now asked, was to direct the proper application of it. In May last, Congress made the appropriation for the year 1842, having no reference to past debts; and, contrary to law, the money was applied to pay them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then said that the whole matter turned upon the single point, whether the members of the Legislature had any knowledge that the amount of the appropriation was expended, and that there was no money to pay them.

Mr. POPE said that there was no evidence to show that the Legislature had any such knowledge. They met on the first Monday of December, pursuant to adjournment; and the Governor had made no proclamation directing them not to meet. There was no difficulty in the case. The only question was, whether these men, for the short time they met, without any knowledge that the Governor disapproved of their meeting till they assembled together, should be paid.

The question was then taken on Mr. ADAMS's amendment, resulting in ayes 54, noes not counted; but there not being a quorum present, there was no decision.

Mr. CUSHING wished to ask one question, on the answer to which would depend his vote: Did the organic law of the Territory authorize this meeting of the Legislature?

Mr. POPE said that it did.

After some remarks from Mr. McKAY, the reading of the law providing for the sessions of the Legislature was called for by several; and that, together with the provision in the appropriation bill of the last session, referred to by Mr. FILLMORE, was read.

Mr. WISE then said that it appeared that the law authorized the Legislature of the Territory to fix upon the time of its meetings; and that they did fix upon the first Monday in December of every year. Now, these were two leading facts; and he wished to know whether gentlemen contended that the laws above stated were repealed by the proviso in the appropriation bill noticed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE.] He contended that they were not repealed, and that the Legislature met in pursuance of law. He contended also that there was an appropriation to pay them; for the appropriation was made for the year 1842, and they met in December of that year. Now, if the Governor had applied the money to any other purpose, or withheld it from them, it was no fault of theirs. Mr. W. said that he would not only vote for paying them, but he would pass a severe censure on any Governor, State or Territorial, who would dare to make a rump parliament of a Legislature meeting under an organic law.

Some explanations were made, and some conversation ensued, between Messrs. BRIGGS, FILLMORE, WISE, and CUSHING, respecting the appropriation for the Territorial Legislature.

Mr. BRIGGS understood that there was an appropriation for the pay of the members of the Legislature during the month of December, which embraced the greater part of their session.

Mr. WISE took the same view; but said that the Governor of the Territory had applied that money to pay arrearages of the Legislature; and he complained that this was a trick on the legislation of Congress.

Mr. MORGAN entered into some explanations.

Mr. MEDILL handed to the Clerk a report from a committee of the Territorial Legislature, which entered into the great question involved in the difference between that body and the Governor, and the legality of the meeting of the Legislature. He called upon the Clerk to read this report for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read it accordingly.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the committee rise; which was negatived.

Mr. EVERETT and Mr. WISE continued the debate.

Mr. HOWARD defended Governor Doty, and read from a pamphlet to show that he had been guided in his action on the subject in dispute, by an act of the Legislature of the Territory, passed the 15th February, 1842, from which he read an extract.

He then went on to vindicate Governor Doty, and to charge that the faults found with him to-day were intended to be made the ground of an application for his removal. He vindicated Governor D., and expressed it as his opinion that that officer was quite as competent to decide questions of law as the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the committee rise, and report the several bills laid aside to be reported.

The vote was taken, and resulted ayes 58, noes 58—no quorum.

Tellers were ordered, who reported ayes 58, noes 59—no quorum.

The committee then rose, and reported the fact to the House.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the House adjourn.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted—yeas 58, nays 72.

The House having again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that, in any view of the case, the Legislature ought to be paid. Suppose the appropriation of $20,000 was designed to apply to the preceding session, and that the money was properly applied by Governor Doty. Then, the Legislature meeting at their annual session, without having any information that the appropriation was exhausted, and that there was no money to pay them, certainly ought to be paid. On the other hand, if the appropriation was for that session, and the money was misapplied by Governor Doty, they having no knowledge of the fact, still they ought to be paid. In either view of the case, the money was justly due them, and they ought to have it.

The question was again put on Mr. ADAMS's amendment, resulting in ayes 35, noes 70.

No quorum voting, tellers were called for, and ordered; and the vote being again taken, resulted in ayes 34, noes 71.

The committee then being still without a quorum, rose, and reported the fact to the House.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted in yeas 53, nays 58.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then rose, and said that there was no use in moving a call of the House. He never knew any good to result from it, and he would, therefore, suggest that the best thing they could do would be to adjourn.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 3, 1843.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial of citizens of Clark county, Ohio, residing on the line of the Cumberland road from Springfield to the Indiana line, remonstrating against the proposed change in the location of the road, and asking for an appropriation for its continuation: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, presented a memorial from citizens of Philadelphia, relating to the judgment by which Mr. Kendall is now deprived of his personal liberty, and urging upon Congress the propriety of relieving him, by satisfying the judgment: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EVANS presented a memorial from citizens of Eastport, Maine, connected with the shipping interest, complaining of the depressed state of that interest, and attributing it to the want of reciprocity in the commercial regulations between the United States and the nations with which she trades; and praying such alterations in those regulations, consistent with treaty stipulations, as will produce greater reciprocity: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a petition from John H. Sherburne, asking compensation for services under appointment from the War Department, rendered in connexion with the removal of the Indians from Florida: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented memorials from Ithaca, Rochester, Jefferson county, Cayuga county, New York, one from the city of New York, and one from Erie county, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from the chiefs and principal men of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribes of Indians, in the Territory of Wisconsin, on the subject of the bill before Congress containing provisions for those Indians to become citizens of the United States: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire if any (and, if any, what) legislative measures are necessary to secure the Shawnee tribe of Indians the payment of interest on moneys invested by the United States for the said tribe, under the 4th article of the treaty of 1801.

Mr. B. presented documents relating to the subject; which were referred to the same committee.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial from citizens of Philadelphia, praying for the creation of a Government stock of $200,000,000, based on the public domain, to be divided among the States and Territories, in a representative proportion: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from citizens of northern Pennsylvania, concerning the operations of the bankrupt law. The memorialists state that they are aware that some good may grow out of that law; but the preponderance of the evil is so great, that, in nineteen out of twenty cases, it is absolute oppression and tyranny: and they ask for its repeal. The memorial was ordered to lie on the table, the Committee on the Judiciary being about to report on the subject.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which lies on the table one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the President be requested (so far as it may be compatible with the public interest) to communicate to the Senate copies of any remonstrance or protest addressed by General Cass, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of France, to that Government, against the ratification, by France, of the quintuple treaty, and of all correspondence between the Government of the United States and France, and of all communications from the said General Cass to his own Government, and from this Government to him, relating thereto, and relating to the late treaty with Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate, for the purpose of transmitting to the Judiciary Committee in the other House the petition and documents relating to the claim of Jenkins and Langtry.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill for the remission of duties on railroad iron; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred House bills for the relief of John Farnham, and for the relief of the legal representatives and heirs of William Lomax, reported them back, without amendment, and with reports (which were ordered to be printed) recommending their indefinite postponement.

Also, reported back from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the House bill for the relief of Jonathan Britton.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, (to which had been referred Senate bill to repeal the bankrupt law, and a similar bill from the House of Representatives, and memorials and resolutions on the subject of the repeal,) made a report, recommending the indefinite postponement of the Senate bill, and reported back the House bill with an entire substitute for it. He asked for the printing of the report and substitute for the bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved that 1,500 copies additional to the usual quantity of the report and bill be printed.

Mr. KING inquired whether it was a detailed report.

Mr. BERRIEN remarked that the report and bill were of great length. The committee had gone into an examination of all the questions connected with the subject which had been presented for the consideration of the Senate, through the report of the Secretary of State, of the decisions of the judges of the district courts under that law.

Mr. KING could not perceive why they should print an extra quantity of this report. The object of the report, he presumed, was for the benefit of those who had to legislate upon the subject. If it was intended that the report should be printed for circulation, with a view to base the response of the country upon it, before the action of the Senate on the bill, he would only say that it must fail of its object; for the action of the Senate will, no doubt, have taken place before such response could be received. If the report was not a very voluminous one, it would find its way into the newspapers, and be circulated much sooner than it could be by the other mode. He did not presume that, at this short session, any return of public opinion could be had before the action of the Senate: the expense of printing would, therefore, be uselessly incurred. He hoped it would not be printed.

Mr. TALLMADGE remarked that the expense of printing the additional quantity proposed would be very trifling. After it was printed, he had no doubt there would be calls for it from every part of the country. As to whether there would be time, before the action of the Senate on the bill, to have a response from the people on the report and bill of the committee, he would only say that there was a possibility, at least; and he might express the hope that, after the report shall have been examined, Senators on the other side, even, would be convinced that the law should remain on the statute-book.

Mr. WOODBURY said that, if the report was not long, he would like to hear it read.

Mr. BERRIEN replied that the report was a voluminous one; and there was a long bill accompanying it, which the committee propose as a substitute for the bill which passed the House. Mr. B. then stated, in substance, that the substitute proposed to repeal so much of the voluntary clause of the previous law as allowed any person, on his own application, to take the benefit of the law; that it proposed to make the declaration of insolvency conform to the provisions of the act of 6 William IV; that it leaves it to the option of the creditor to suspend action after a declaration of insolvency, or to proceed to close up the affairs of the debtor, under such declaration of insolvency; that the remaining part of the law was so amended as to confine its provisions to what are technically called traders; that it proposed to make the consent of a majority in amount of the creditors necessary to the granting of a certificate to a bankrupt. He said there were other important alterations which he could not cite from memory.

The question was put on the motion to print the additional quantity, and decided in the affirmative —ayes 16, noes 14.

Mr. STURGEON, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill for the relief of William Gale.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported adversely to the passage of the bill from the House, for the relief of Anne W. Angus: the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Patents, under instruction from that committee, moved to print the annual report of the Commission of Patents; and also to print a quantity in addition to the usual number: the motions were referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MILLER gave notice that he would on Monday ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill for repairing and repaving Pennsylvania avenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting a report showing the number of clerks and other persons employed in that department during the year 1842, and their salaries: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BAGBY, on leave, introduced a bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved June, 1838; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The unfinished debate on the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory, came up as the special order—the question pending being to recommit the bill to a select committee.

Mr. CHOATE, being entitled to the floor from yesterday evening, addressed the Senate for about an hour, in reply to Mr. BENTON'S remarks of yesterday.

He confined himself chiefly to that portion of the speech of the Senator from Missouri which related to the treaty lately settled between this country and Great Britain, and particularly touching the Northwest boundary at this side of the Rocky Mountains, between the Lake of the Woods and Lake Superior. The force of Mr. C.'s argument was to show that the true boundary line intended by the treaty of 1783 was that adopted by the treaty of 1842. First, he held that, at the time, no other route was known than that by the Grand Portage and southern chain of water and portage communication; and that the northern water communication never had been travelled, or, if it had, that the Senator from Missouri could not produce proof that, from the creation of the world to the year 1783, a human being had ever passed from Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods by the northern route. In support of his view that the Portage route was the boundary line intended by the treaty of 1783, he adverted to various documentary and historical evidences, and referred to the English maps of the day, and the writings of persons belonging to the Northwest fur companies. He insisted that, where he was able to produce such a quantity of concurrent testimony in support of his position, and the Senator from Missouri had not hitherto produced a particle of evidence in proof of his, the conclusion was inevitable that the southern route was that intended by the treaty of 1783; and therefore the treaty of 1842, instead of altering the boundary line, had merely carried out, in fact, the spirit and intention of the old treaty.

Mr. BENTON assured the Senator that his proofs of the northern line being the proper one were abundant and overwhelming. He had a point now, which he meant to stick to, until the attention of the American people was fixed upon it; and that was, that their interests had been sacrificed to British interests, and the boundary line of the United States had been removed for the exclusive benefit of the British, and to the irreparable injury of our own country. He took the treaty of 1783, and read its provisions in relation to the boundary line between the Lake of the Woods and Lake Superior, and showed that they explicitly and expressly mentioned that from Pigeon river the water communication was to be followed for tracing the line. Now, the northern water communication from Pigeon river is continuous, with the exception of a portage of 697 paces; whereas the southern route is not, strictly speaking, a water communication, but a route partly water and partly portage—the portage amounting, altogether, to 27 miles. It was easy to see that the term "water communication" could only apply to the northern route; and that nothing but a strained construction, to give the British all the benefit of the mere technicality that there was no continuous water communication, could have been adopted to fix upon the portage route as the boundary line meant by the treaty of 1783. He then compared the most accurate American map lately published, in which all the land and water marks are accurately laid down, with the wording of the treaty of 1783; and proved that there was such a circumstantial corroboration that the northern line was the true boundary line meant, that it was impossible to avoid that conclusion, unless a predetermination existed to interpret everything just as the British wished. The British themselves, until 1814, never thought of any other line; or why would they then ask in such gentle language for a revision of the boundary line? Why did they, in 1802, remove from the Grand Portage to a position 50 miles north, but to get off our territory, and escape paying duties to us for goods brought within what they then knew was our territory? Mr. B. read various historical facts concerning Mr. Jay's treaty of 1794, which treaty was not to go into effect till 1796, to show that it was in consequence of Mr. Jay's refusal to give the British fur company any joint right of communication south of the northern water communication, that they had to remove, in 1802, fifty miles north, where they remained forty years, till brought back by our Secretary-negotiator in 1842, and allowed the exclusive occupation of the portage route—for it was idle to call it a joint occupation, as our citizens could not attempt anything jointly about it, without subjecting themselves to be waylaid and shot down by the company's allies, their Indian bloodhounds. This company, which could now command twelve hundred of its own men, congregated on the northern bank of Arrow river, within a stone's throw of our territory, had been thus advantageously placed for British interests, in every way adverse to our interests—in a position better than they occupied last war, when it cost us sixty millions of dollars to defend ourselves against their aggressions, and those of their bloodhound allies, the Indians. Our Secretary-negotiator, studious of promoting British interests and prostrating those of his own country, had allowed this Hudson Bay Company a joint use of our portage route, entirely within our own territory, and the only commercial route in the whole region; and had exempted their goods from the duties which our own citizens would have to pay on them. He had precluded our citizens from competing with them on equal terms, and called this a joint use, where everything should be exclusively advantageous to the British. Yet this was the effect of a treaty which the Senator from Massachusetts called upon us to thank God Almighty and Daniel Webster for having blessed us with. He also tells us of the insignificance of this mere use of the portage, which he considers of mere mutual convenience. But how is it that the British are so covetous of everything worthless that belongs to us? If such things are so valueless, why are they at such pains to attain them? It is because they are of inestimable value in their far-reaching policy.

Mr. B. referred to the negotiations with our commissioners, and General Porter's refusal to accede to the British propositions, on the ground that he had no authority to depart from the terms of the treaty of 1783. He quoted the correspondence and negotiations of every period since 1783, in which any effort was made by Great Britain to get a revision of the boundary line; and concluded by showing that the present Secretary of State had done what all previous American statesmen, negotiators, and administrations had, with true American hearts, and feelings alive to American interests, utterly refused to do. It was now, for the first time, that an American negotiator, with British interests at heart—an American negotiator whose feelings throughout the late war were with the British; and who, after the massacre at the river Raisin, asked us if that was the entertainment to which we were invited;—it was now, for the first time, that we had an American negotiator capable of sacrificing the interests of his country for British interests—of altering our boundary line to the entire aggrandizement of England, and the disadvantage of the United States; and to give a British trading company an exemption from duties in our own territory, to which our citizens, in competition with them, are subjected. But it was all of a piece with the favor he showed the British throughout the late war, and corresponds with the part he took against his own country.

Mr. B. rejoiced that he had at last roused the attention of the Senate to the importance of this question about the Northwest boundary line. He should now stick to it until the whole country was roused up to a proper understanding of the matter. The people of the United States should see how their Secretary-negotiator had sacrificed their interests and rights of their country to the same British power whose advocate he was in war. They shall see that there is a striking conformity between his negotiations now, and his speeches during that war.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said as he had been requested to state to the Senate the opinion he entertained as to the general correctness of the account given by Mr. McGillivray respecting the Northwestern boundary, he could only say that, as far as Mr. McGillivray himself was concerned, he was a man whose character, reputation, and standing, rendered his statements, in his (Mr. W.'s) opinion, worthy of the fullest credence. Mr. W. proceeded to state that Mr. McGillivray, who had been a highly respected member of the Colonial Government of Canada, had brought upon himself the censure of the British ministry by the course he took in regard to that boundary, because it was considered more favorable to this country than to Great Britain. No one could be better able than that gentleman was to give an accurate account of the situation of the country, for no man was better acquainted with its true situation.

Mr. CHOATE said he presumed that we now had the whole proof which the honorable Senator from Missouri was able to adduce in support of his position. And in what did it consist? There was nothing but this map which the honorable Senator had exhibited to them. [Mr. BENTON. There are forty others.] But those we had not seen. He had asked the honorable Senator to go back as far as the year 1783, and give any evidence sufficient to constitute a reasonable ground of belief that his position was correct; and he referred him to a map made in the year 1839, by a patriotic countryman of his own, who knew nothing about the matter which was now the subject in dispute. The Senator declared that there were forty other maps which would show the same thing. He (Mr. CHOATE) believed he might safely aver that every one of the forty was equally at fault in respect to this matter.

It was well known to every one that it was Mitchell's map which had been the main guide in the formation of treaties. He prayed the attention of the Senator from Missouri and of the Senate to Mitchell's map, which he now exhibited to them. Our own patriotic diplomatists had said of Mitchell's map, that, though in some respects erroneous, it was upon the whole the best, and we ought to stick to it. This map furnished additional evidence in favor of the southern route.

Mr. C. then proceeded to argue that the southern route had always been the recognised boundary, and that no change had been made in it under the late treaty; that it remained precisely as settled by Mr. Jay's treaty; and he again called upon the Senator from Missouri to produce evidence to sustain the position he had taken.

Mr. BENTON said the Senator had rejected the testimony of his own countrymen, and had taken that of the British. The gentleman seemed willing to rely upon this British map in this case, although he would not permit it to be any authority in the case of the Northeastern boundary. If the gentleman was so fond of citing British authorities, he should have the opportunity of examining the affidavits of eight of the Northwest Company.

He was now done with the matter for the present; but he would yet demonstrate to the American people, that the line had been altered, and ingloriously altered.

Mr. ARCHER said the whole of the Senate must be sensible that this debate had gone far enough. He hoped it would now be terminated. He rose for the purpose of withdrawing the motion, which was before the Senate, for the recommitment of the bill to a select committee; for he had been advised, and had become convinced, that such a motion was irregular and unparliamentary. He could not persist in the motion, although he still desired to attain the object he had in view in making it—namely, to ascertain the sense of the Senate as to the propriety of retaining that clause which had given rise to so much debate. If that object could not be accomplished in any other way, he now gave notice that he would renew the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALKER expressed himself in favor of the bill in its present form, and had been its advocate for five years. The Senator from Virginia misconceived him, if he understood him as desiring to make a motion to strike out the provision by a unanimous vote. He had merely suggested to the gentlemen favorable to the general objects of the bill, but opposed to the provision for granting lands, that they might, by unanimous consent, be allowed to be placed in such a position as to enable them to take a direct vote on that point.

Mr. LINN remarked that the Senator from Virginia would see that the motion to strike out could not come from the friends of the bill. The Senator himself might make it.

Here a conversational discussion arose as to the best mode of attaining the object of taking a direct vote on the land provision, and other portions of the bill considered objectionable; and it was at last decided that the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed, and the vote on concurring in the amendments of the committee of the whole, should be reconsidered; which was done.

The bill then came up as in committee of the whole again; when

Mr. BENTON rose and stated that, to his utter astonishment, on looking to the map which the Senator from Massachusetts had, when up a few moments ago, presented to the Senate as evidence of the boundary line of 1783, he had found it was Mitchell's old map of 1755. When the Senator argued from it, he (Mr. B.) and, he supposed, all the Senate, took it for granted it was Mitchell's improved map of some date subsequent to the treaty of 1783. To his utter astonishment, he found that a map printed eight-and-twenty years before the treaty of peace—a map printed in 1755—was brought forward to show the boundary line settled by a treaty of 1783!

Mr. CHOATE said he had called for Mitchell's map, and that it had been brought to him. His object in using it was to show the only water-course known at the time.

Mr. BENTON remarked that Hunter's island was not laid down in that map at all.

Here the subject of the map dropped, and the discussion on the motion pending when the interruption occurred was resumed.

Mr. ARCHER now made the motion to strike out the clause of the bill about which there had been so much discussion, granting land to settlers in the Oregon.

Mr. LINN demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON expressed the opinion that the bill would be useless and valueless without the clause holding out inducements for persons to settle that territory—the clause giving or promising a bonus in land. He would vote against striking it out. And if it was stricken out, he would not vote for any appropriation, conceiving that it would then be useless. The object of the bill was to settle the country; and no settlement could be obtained without the inducement. He hoped the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. BAGBY said he would vote to strike out the clause; but, in thus voting he did not wish it to be considered as an indication of a change of opinion in regard to the late treaty. The two subjects had been connected in debating this question, which was the reason why he thought it proper that he should make this declaration. His opinions as to the late treaty had undergone no change.

Mr. CALHOUN was understood to take exception to the manner in which the vote was about to be taken. He understood that a general consent had been given to a reconsideration of the vote on the engrossment, and on the amendment of the committee of the whole to the bill, with a view to afford those who had objections to the provisions of the bill, besides the land clause, an opportunity to have those objectionable parts removed. But, as the question was then presented, that opportunity could not be afforded. If the land clause should be stricken out, it would not remove his objections to the bill. He had further objections to it. It was his desire to make the provisions of the bill conform, in all respects, to existing treaty stipulations. It was important that it should. With a view of preserving his inclination to produce such conformity, it was necessary that the bill should be committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Gentlemen could strike out the land provision, or not, as it might please them; but he would stand aloof, if his inclination to make the bill conform in all its parts to the treaty stipulations could not be preserved. It was well known that it was the desire of a majority of those who had spoken against the bill to have it committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations; therefore the vote about to be taken could not remove that desire.

Some conversation here took place between Messrs. SEVIER, WALKER, CALHOUN, KING, and BUCHANAN, as to the object for which the general consent of the Senate had been given to admit a motion for the reconsideration of the vote on the engrossment of the bill. The discussion was ended, however, by Mr. CONRAD, who renewed the motion (which had been previously made, but withdrawn) to commit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LINN demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr. TAPPAN moved to amend the motion to commit, so as to make it a motion to commit, with instructions to strike out the clause giving a bounty in land.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend that amendment with the words "and such other parts as the committee may think expedient."

Mr. ARCHER suggested to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAPPAN] to withdraw the amendment to commit with instructions. It would be better to let it go to the committee without limitation.

Mr. TAPPAN acquiesced in the suggestion, and withdrew his proposition.

The question was then taken on the motion to commit and decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, McDuffie, Miller, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—24.

The question now recurring on the motion to strike out the clause giving a bounty, in land, of 640 acres to each individual settler—

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that the motion to commit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with a view to make its provisions conform to treaty stipulations, having failed, he would, consequently, vote for striking out the land clause.

The question was then put on striking out the land clause; and decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, McDuffie, Miller, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge,—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—24.

The amendments of the committee of the whole were concurred in; and the question now being, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. HUNTINGTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McDUFFIE was understood to express a desire to say something on the bill before the final vote was decided, and desired a postponement of the question for that purpose.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana; Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, McDuffie, Miller, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—22.

Mr. MERRICK expressed the hope that the question would be taken on the final passage of the bill. It had been a long time under discussion, and had impeded the progress of other important bills. He had no doubt every Senator's mind was made up as to the passage of the bill. Nothing could be gained by the party opposed to the bill, by the delay of the question on its passage, because there were but four members absent, two of whom were known to be in favor of the bill.

Mr. SEVIER made some remarks not distinctly heard.

Mr. MERRICK said if the bill was postponed till Monday, he was confident the discussion would be renewed. He hoped the question would be put.

Mr. McDUFFIE here waived his desire to speak on the bill before the vote on its passage.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed on a count—ayes 24, noes not counted.

Mr. TALLMADGE gave notice that he would, on Monday, move to postpone all previous special orders of that day, with the view of taking up the exchequer bill.

On motion, it was agreed, that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn till Monday next.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER,

The Senate adjourned till Monday.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire and report to the House whether the several resolutions of the House adopted at the last session for the retrenchment of the expenditures of the House have been carried into effect there; and in what manner the same has been done; and that they also report whether any and what further steps should be taken in relation thereto, for the enforcement of the orders of the House, or the curtailment of its expenditures.

Mr. CUSHING asked if the subject was not already in charge of one of the standing committees.

The SPEAKER said no.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then expressed a desire that he should not be put on the committee, and that it should be composed of the same gentlemen who constituted the retrenchment committee of last session.

The SPEAKER inquired what number the committee should consist of.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that five would be the most appropriate number.

Mr. DEAN, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill to establish a town at the Cedar Key in Florida: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GENTRY gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of George Mayfield."

The committees were then called on for reports.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the payment of navy pensions due on the 1st July, 1843, and on the 1st January, 1844: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. OSBORNE and Mr. WARREN, from the same committee, made several adverse reports; which were ordered to lie.

On motion of Mr. WINTHROP, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of bills 575 and 576; and the same were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the general, civil, and diplomatic appropriation bill, and that the said bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with a view to the introduction, by that committee, of a new bill: the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL of Maine, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of the owners of the schooner Joseph of Wareham; and also a bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Perdido: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BOARDMAN moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

This motion was voted down by a large majority, and the bill ordered to lie on the Speaker's table.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the further consideration of the bill No. 334, and the same was ordered to lie on the Speaker's table.

MAYOR OF ALEXANDRIA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported the Senate bill "to amend the charter of the town of Alexandria," providing for the election of the Mayor of Alexandria by the people. He hoped the bill would be passed without delay, and for that purpose moved the previous question.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said this was an important bill, and therefore should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER inquired whether the gentleman from Kentucky insisted on his motion for the previous question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he did.

The SPEAKER then said the bill could not be debated.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the reading of the bill, and it was read accordingly. He then inquired what were the present qualifications required of voters in the town of Alexandria.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that all housekeepers might vote at present for members of the Common Council.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON. Then the bill still confines the right of suffrage to freeholders only.

Mr. WELLER moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked for the yeas and nays on the motion. They were taken, and resulted—yeas 51, nays 127.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The question then recurred on the second to the demand for the previous question; which was carried, and the main question ordered.

The main question, being on the third reading of the bill, was also carried; and the bill was read the third time and passed.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1843. VOLUME 12....No. 16

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the same committee, reported a bill allowing a pension to John Taylor, and a bill allowing a pension to Nancy Williams; which were severally twice read, and referred.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety and justice of allowing pensions to the widows of those officers of the navy who perished in the United States ship Hornet, while on a cruise in the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. CALVARY MORRIS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, without amendment, the bill from the Senate for the relief of Wareham Kingsley.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Select Committee on Steamboat Navigation, reported an amendatory bill on the subject of safety-valves, &c.; which was twice read, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of acting on private bills, and suggested that bills about which there is no dispute should be first acted on.

Mr. CUSHING asked if the morning hour was passed; and, being answered in the negative, called for the consideration of his resolution on the subject of French spoliations prior to 1800.

The resolution was then taken up and read as follows:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, on House bill No. 57, entitled "A bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens, for spoliations committed on their commerce prior to 31st July, 1801," shall cease on Tuesday next, at 2 o'clock, and the committee shall proceed to vote on the amendments then pending, or that may be offered to said bill, and then report the bill to the House, with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CUSHING called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, on taking the question, resulted in yeas 97, nays 93.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. FILLMORE appealed to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. LEVY,] who had the floor this morning on the special order, (being a bill for the relief of inhabitants of West Florida,) to allow the pension bill to be taken up. The pensions were to be paid on the 4th of March; and the money wherewith the payments had to be made must be despatched to different parts of the country, which would occupy some time. He, therefore, hoped it would now be taken up; and, as it would consume but a short time, the Delegate from Florida could afterwards address the House on the special order.

Mr. LEVY yielded to what he understood to be the wish of the House; but, at the same time, he asked the House to take up the unfinished Territorial business to-day, and dispose of it.

Mr. FILLMORE moved, then, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GIDDINGS appealed to the gentleman from New York, and to the House, to allow the calendar of private bills to be taken up, and to dispose of the undisputed claims. This would occupy but about thirty minutes; whereas he feared the pension bill would consume the day. He moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of disposing of the undisputed claims.

Mr. LEVY suggested that undisputed Territorial business should be included.

The motion was agreed to, with Mr. LEVY's amendment; and Mr. BOARDMAN took the chair.

The titles of the bills on the calendar were then read in their order; but the great majority were objected to, and, consequently, were laid aside. Several were laid aside to be reported to the House.

The bill for the relief of Sam. Weller was taken up, and the report read.

After a few remarks from Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, TOMLINSON, COWEN, and PARMENTER, the bill was laid aside, under objection. (The objection was subsequently withdrawn.)

The bill for the relief of William De Buys was taken up, and the report read. After the adoption of an amendment, it was laid aside to be reported.

The bill for the relief of certain companies of Michigan militia was laid aside to be reported.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert E. Jennings, James Roddy, and R. B. Carter, was objected to by Mr. MERIWETHER—together with several other bills reported for the first time this morning.

The bill for the relief of Seth Sweetser, and the bill for the relief of Hannah Jenkins, were laid aside to be reported.

The bill for the relief of John Taylor was objected to by Mr. MERIWETHER.

The bill in addition to the act providing for the payment of Florida militia called into the service in 1839 and 1840, was taken up, and an amendment offered by Mr. STANLY, authorizing the accounts to be settled under a specified superintendence; which was adopted. The bill was then laid aside to be reported.

The bill to authorize the purchase of a law library for the judges of the Territory of Florida, was objected to.

The bill to establish an additional land office in the Territory of Iowa was informally passed over, at the suggestion of Mr. A. C. DODGE.

The bill granting the right of pre-emption to certain settlers in the Territory of Wisconsin, was laid aside to be reported.

Also, the bill granting to the Territory of Wisconsin a certain tract of land, for the benefit of the town of Fair Play, in said Territory.

The bill making appropriations for certain roads and rivers in Wisconsin, was objected to by Mr. SPRIGG.

After considering several bills in Committee of the Whole, the committee rose, and reported them to the House

Mr. BRIGGS moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill for the relief of John Carey, a colored servant of General Washington. Mr. B. said that this old man was 112 years old, and there was no doubt that he had served General Washington, both at Braddock's defeat, and during the revolutionary war.

Mr. FILLMORE objected, on the ground that this bill could be considered at the same time with the rest; but withdrew his objection.

Mr. MERIWETHER objected; and

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rules; which was agreed to.

Mr. MERIWETHER called for the reading of the report. As the House was about pensioning the poor of the District of Columbia, he should like to hear the reasons for it.

The report was accordingly read; and then the bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. A. C. DODGE moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain roads, and for the survey of a canal route in the Teritory of Iowa—[this bill was passed over yesterday, in consequence of the want of a quorum;] this motion was carried.

PENSION BILL.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SAUNDERS, of North Carolina, in the chair,) and took up the bill making appropriations for revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, for the half calendar year beginning on the 1st January, and ending on the 30th of June, 1843; and for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st July, 1843, and ending on the 30th June, 1844.

No amendment having been offered to this bill, the committee rose, and reported it to the House.

It was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill for the relief of James C. Watson of Georgia. This bill (he said) had been suspended for three years by the objections of a single member; [Mr. GIDDINGS;] and he hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BRIGGS,] who had just succeeded in getting a bill through for a colored pauper of the District, would give him his assistance.

Mr. GIDDINGS objected, that the bill contained an appropriation, and had not been considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERIWETHER said that the bill just passed made an appropriation, and yet it had not been considered in Committee of the Whole. It was strange that the gentleman from Ohio should have so much sympathy for a negro, and refuse to do justice to a white man.

The SPEAKER said that, objection being made, the motion could not be received without a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MERIWETHER accordingly moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. GIDDINGS called for the reading of the report and bill; and they were read.

Mr. G. then called for the yeas and nays on the motion; but they were not ordered; and,

On taking the question, the motion was rejected.

Mr. COWEN moved that the House proceed with the private bills on the calendar, several of which were on their engrossment.

The SPEAKER said that the private calendar would now be taken up.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

On motion of Mr. ARNOLD,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 4, 1843.

Mr. McCLELLAN of New York presented the petition of Aaron Blinn and others, of Columbia county, New York, praying a renewal of the pension act, for the benefit of the widows of revolutionary officers and soldiers.

Mr. NEWHARD presented the memorial of 194 citizens of Schuylkill county, State of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to pass a law authorizing the issue of $200,000,000, to be based upon the public lands, and distributed among the States and Territories.

Mr. GWIN presented a memorial from citizens of Adams county, Mississippi, in favor of the selection of Natchez as the site for a naval armory and dry-dock. He observed that, as there was now a bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having reference to this subject, he moved a similar reference of the memorial, and that it be printed. As he believed that Natchez was the best site that had been suggested to the consideration of the House for the location of the armory and dry-dock, he wished, when the bill came up to be acted on, that the claims of that place, as set forth in the memorial, might be fully before the House.

Mr. KEIM presented the petition of Wm. S. Kennedy and 31 others, praying Congress to liquidate the debt of Amos Kendall, incurred in the discharge of his official duties: referred.

Mr. WM. O. GOODE presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Virginia, praying an increase of salary for the judge of the eastern district in that State.

Also, the petition of the surviving children of Winifred Tomlinson, for a pension.

Also, the petition of Abram Heen, for a pension.

Also, the petition of Frances Crafton, for a pension.

Mr. MOORE presented the following petitions, viz:

Of Paul Le Clerc and 109 others, inhabitants of the parishes of Terrebonne, St. Mary, and Assumption, praying for a post route from Houma to Dutch Settlement, Louisiana.

Of George S. Walmsley and 14 others, and Henry O. McEvery and 33 others, praying for a post route direct from Natchitoches to Monroe, Louisiana.

Mr. HENRY submitted a resolution to discharge the Committee of the Whole from bill No. 295, being an act to extend the provisions of an act supplementary to an act for the relief of certain officers and soldiers of the Revolution, known as the "Indian fighters;" and that it be made the special order for Wednesday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. ADAMS, the use of the hall was granted to Benjamin B. Bowen, for the delivery of a lecture, on Monday evening next, on the education of the blind.

On the motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, the House amended a bill entitled "An act in addition to an act for the payment of Florida militia called into service in the years 1839 and 1840," approved August 23, 1842; and, as amended, it was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. PEARCE called up the question on printing the majority and minority reports from the Judiciary Committee, on the refunding of the fine imposed on General Jackson, by Judge Hall, at New Orleans; and on that he moved the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON called for the reading of the reports.

A conversation ensued, which resulted in the subject being passed over, to avoid the consumption of the time of the House with it to-day; the previous question being left pending.

Mr. HALSTED moved that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill No. 651, entitled "A bill regulating the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections, and for other purposes." [Cries of "No, no, no."]

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FILLMORE asked the House to take up the appropriation bills. There were only twenty-four working days of the session left, and yet the appropriation bills were kept back; and he hoped the House would agree to take them up, that they might be disposed of, and sent to the Senate.

Mr. LEVY was understood to appeal to the gentleman from New York to allow the bill for the relief of inhabitants of West Florida to be taken up. It had been the special order for several days, but, for the promotion of other important business, he had allowed it to be passed over; but he hoped the House would now allow it to be disposed of.

Mr. FILLMORE replied that a greater number of days had already been given to the Territorial business than it was usual to give even at the long sessions; and as all the appropriation bills had been kept back, he could not allow them to remain longer on the table, by waiving his motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARRETT DAVIS gave notice that he should move that the committee take up the bill to reduce the number of officers in the New York custom-house.

The question was then taken, and the motion to go into committee carried in the affirmative. (Mr. ALLEN of Maine took the chair.)

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the committee take up the navy appropriation bill.

Mr. ADAMS opposed the motion.

Mr. GARRETT DAVIS asked for the yeas and nays (laughter)—he meant to say tellers—on the motion.

They were not ordered, and the motion was carried without a division.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House bill No. 659, entitled "A bill making appropriations for the naval service for the half calendar year, beginning on the 1st of January and ending on the 30th of June, 1843, and for the fiscal year ending on the 30th June, 1844," was then read through.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to lay the bill on the table, with a view to take up the bill to reduce the number of officers in the New York custom-house, or some other bill. The present bill involved several millions of dollars, and gentlemen were not yet prepared with the necessary information to enable them to vote and act understandingly upon it. As the bill now before the committee would be soon acted upon, when members were prepared for it, (and it would not be delayed beyond Wednesday next,) he moved that it be laid on the table.

Mr. FILLMORE said the motion was not in order. There was no such thing as laying a bill on the table in committee.

Mr. MERIWETHER. Then I move to postpone the bill.

Mr. FILLMORE opposed the motion.

Mr. G. DAVIS asked for tellers, who were ordered, and reported—ayes 49, noes 58; no quorum.

The vote was again taken and resulted—ayes 48, noes 85; so the House refused to postpone the navy bill.

Mr. MERIWETHER then rose and offered the following amendment:

Add to the first section this proviso:

Provided, That, until otherwise directed by law, no part of the present, or any future appropriations for the pay of commissioned, warrant, and petty officers, including the engineer corps, shall be paid to the same, except upon a reduction of the present pay at and after the rate of twenty per cent. per annum.

Mr. M. said he had but a few remarks to make upon this amendment. It might be asked why he proposed to reduce the pay of navy officers, and let that of all other officers of the Government stand as at present. He would answer, that the pay of the navy officers was increased in 1835, and that of none others. Their pay was then increased with the view of meeting the increased price of provisions and of labor in every department of life. Now, he believed that nine-tenths of the evils under which our navy was suffering, resulted from the high salaries paid to its officers. It was composed of the most disorderly corps he knew of in any existing Government. Indeed, it seemed necessary to keep a court-martial sitting nearly the entire year for their trial for offences.

Here Mr. FILLMORE rose to a question of order. He contended that the amendment was not in order at this time. This bill proposed to pay money due, according to a pre-existing law. If it were merely a bill making contingent appropriations, it would be perfectly competent to limit and prescribe the amount, and manner of making the appropriation. The amendment in reality changed existing laws, and he submitted whether it was in order.

Mr. MERIWETHER said he had anticipated this objection. Whenever any one talked of reducing the expenditures of the Government, they were met with a question of order. So it was last session, when the House limited the number of officers. Certainly, if the House could limit the number of officers, it might also limit their pay.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be in order.

Mr. FILLMORE appealed from the decision of the Chair, and made some remarks on the question of order.

The appeal was debated by Messrs. FILLMORE, CAVE JOHNSON, TILLINGHAST, WISE, HOLMES, REYNOLDS, and CHARLES BROWN.

The committee sustained the decision of the Chair—70 in the affirmative, and 63 in the negative.

Mr. MERIWETHER then advocated his amendment, and said there was no department of this Government in which a compensation like that which he proposed to reduce was given for a similar grade of talent in the service of the United States. He traced the increased pay now given to the year 1835; and said that, by a document in his possession, he could show that it was then increased, in some instances, 75 or 100 per cent. over what it was before that year: whereas he now proposed a reduction of only 20 per cent. He read a tabular statement, showing the difference of the pay of officers of various grades at the two periods mentioned. He also pointed out an increase of the number of guns afloat, and the cost of pay for each; and contended that the cost of the navy was more now than it was during the war with Great Britain. He advocated a reduction of this branch of the public service at some length.

Mr. WISE replied. He admitted that the pay proper of officers in the naval service was now apparently greater than it was at the period of which the gentleman from Georgia had spoken; but there were then rations, and other things—which by the sailors were termed, in their expressive phraseology, "wee things aboot the deck"—which materially diminished that difference, and left the pay but little less than is now given.

Mr. W. went into an explanation of the manner in which the pay of the navy was increased in 1835, developing the principles on which the Congress of that year—the best in which he had ever served—and the controlling reasons which induced such an increase of pay. He said that Congress then determined to put the corps of officers on the best footing, and to get the best men in the country, by making the pay adequate to their services; that Congress acted on a principle which, he thought, ought never to be lost sight of; that it was easy to build ships—easy to fit out a whole fleet in a very short time; but it required years to make a good officer. Mr. W. thought if the gentleman wished retrenchment, he had better move to strike out the appropriation for increasing the materials on hand for building ships. In that, the gentleman would not strike a blow at the service. He also suggested to the gentleman, instead of moving a tori-zontal reduction of salaries, to move a more equal distribution of pay—giving the little midshipmen less, and the passed midshipmen and warrant officers more. A horizontal reduction of 20 per cent. would make the pay lower than it was in 1835, when all admitted that the pay was too low; and when, after a full investigation, it was increased.

He then went into an argument against the reduction of the navy—answering the objections urged against its present strength, on the ground of the prospect of permanent peace; and alleging the extent of our commerce on every sea, as a reason for the keeping up of our naval force. He explained the case of Commodore Jones, and the capture of Monterey; and argued that, in case of any resistance by the British fleet, Commodore Jones would have been overpowered, and the American flag struck. He adverted to the state of our trade in various parts of the world as being in a declining state, whilst the English trade was increasing; and all owing to the superior fleet of the British.

Mr. McKEON offered an amendment to the amendment, providing that no part of this appropriation shall be applied to the pay of officers, or to the equipping of vessels, to be employed on the coast of Africa, under the late treaty with England.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. PROFFIT then got the floor, and addressed the House for a few moments; when

Mr. McKEON interrupted him; and, not understanding that his amendment had been decided to be out of order, wished to take an appeal.

The CHAIR said that it was too late to appeal; and, after some conversation between Messrs. McKEON, PROFFIT, and the CHAIR,

Mr. PROFFIT proceeded with his remarks in opposition to the amendment, and gave a statement of the high pay and emoluments of the superior officers of the British navy as an argument why the pay of the officers of our navy should not be reduced.

He gave way to a motion to rise, after speaking some minutes; and the committee rose and reported progress accordingly.

Mr. GILMER and Mr. I. D. JONES made motions of reconsideration of votes passing two several bills yesterday; which were entered.

Several Executive communications were presented to the House, and referred. They were the following:

From the War Department, in answer to a resolution submitted by Mr. J. P. KENNEDY, calling for the number of officers in the Baltimore custom-house, &c; another, authorizing a report from the officer in charge of the Ordnance Bureau, showing the expenses of the national armories for the year 1842; another, with estimates of the appropriations for the War Department for the year 1843, and the balance of appropriations; another, showing the names of clerks in that department; another, exhibiting the contingencies of that department. There was also one from the Post Office Department, with estimates for the mail service for the year 1843.

The following Senate bills were read twice and referred:

A bill for the relief of William Russell.

A bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Twig.

Mr. STANLY, pursuant to notice, introduced a bill to amend "An act entitled an act making appropriations for the erection of a marine hospital in North Carolina;" which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Connecticut, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of John Sands; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

On the motion of Mr. HOPKINS, the bill for the relief of B. O. Tayloe was modified, amended, and passed. The House then adjourned.

Mr. WALKER presented a memorial from citizens of Harrison county, Mississippi, praying for a donation of a section of land for the purposes of a manual-labor school: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. W. also presented additional testimony in support of the claim of G. A. Worth; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CHOATE rose, and said he presumed this was as proper a moment as any other to say a word (though he did so with great reluctance) concerning a matter of personal insult towards himself. His attention had been called by a friend, on Saturday last, to an editorial paragraph which represented him as having, in the debate upon the Oregon bill, introduced into the Senate and exhibited Mitchell's map, representing it as having traced upon it the treaty line of 1842, and that, the map being found defective in this particular, the Senate immediately marked its disapprobation of the intention to deceive. He confessed he was somewhat sensitive as to this matter; and he took, therefore, the earliest opportunity, in the most public, as well as the most dignified manner, to contradict the statement. It was not a mere caricature, to which they were all exposed daily, but a deliberate insult. The facts were these: The Senator from Missouri had endeavored to strengthen his arguments by reference to certain maps; and he (Mr. C.) had briefly commented upon these maps, and had also referred to Mitchell's map, which he had stated was known to everybody; and that it had been under the eye of the commissioners who negotiated the question of the Northwest boundary; and that, although it was acknowledged to have some errors, yet that it was considered by our early diplomatists as the best guide, and was adhered to in almost all cases. He had, therefore, proceeded to open, and to comment upon that old map, pointing out what there was in it which he thought strengthened his argument, and his general suggestion upon the examination of the water communication as laid down therein was, that that route for which he had been contending was the only continuous line of water communication; that the line as delineated upon the map bore so strong a resemblance to that specified in the treaty of 1783; and that it afforded to his mind some countenance to the position for which he had contended. He had not said that the actual boundary was laid down in the map. There was, in fact, no Northwest boundary line delineated upon it; and he would have supposed that the folly, the insanity of pointing out to the Senate a line which did not exist upon the map, would have suggested itself to even an unfriendly editor. Had there been a plain boundary line drawn upon the map, it would not have made out the point he was contending for; for it was the water communication which formed the subject of his remarks. And there was no doubt whatever on his mind, that the water communication delineated on the map was the same as that described in the treaty.

There was a still more erroneous and insulting statement made in latter part of the paragraph—namely, that he (Mr. C.) had withheld or suppressed the fact that the map appeared to be dated prior to 1783; and that when the true date was revealed, it was received not only as a perfect answer to his argument, but with an expression of disapprobation at his audacity. That he, by anything he had said or argued, endeavored to insinuate that the map was of a date subsequent to 1783, was totally and entirely destitute of a shadow of a shade of foundation. He had characterized the map as Mitchell's old map; the date was not in his mind at the time; but he had produced it as the original map which was before the eye of the commissioners in 1783. The truth was, the date was not at all necessary to his argument. And when it was announced that the map was made before 1783, if any one (as represented in the paragraph he had referred to) came near bursting with derision, he could only say that it was a total misapprehension of the issue that was made. If there were any Senators about him whose recollection coincided with his own, he would be extremely glad to hear them so declare.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said, although he conceived the necessity could hardly be supposed to exist for his saying anything in corroboration of the statement just made by the Senator from Massachusetts, yet, as an appeal had been made, he would state that he certainly did distinctly recollect that the argument of the honorable Senator was founded on the presumption—and the strong presumption—that the view which the honorable Senator had taken was the correct one, from the circumstance of the course of the water communication westward from Lake Superior, as laid down in that map, corresponding with the water communication contended for by the honorable Senator as forming the boundary. As far as the article in the Globe was concerned, he had not seen it, and knew nothing about it; but, most assuredly, the remarks made by the honorable Senator as to the purport of his argument were substantially correct.

Mr. WALKER said the Senator from Massachusetts certainly did call his attention to the matter, and pointed out to him the map, as being the old map of Mitchell; and his object seemed to be to prove that the southern line of water communication corresponded with the line for which he had been contending. He thought it due to the Senator to say that he did call his attention particularly to the map; but while he said this, he begged it to be understood as having nothing to do with his opinion as to the success or failure of the honorable Senator in establishing his views.

Mr. SIMMONS said his attention had also been called to the map; and he had noticed that the curvature in the line of water communication corresponded with that which the Senator from Massachusetts argued was the true boundary. And he noticed, also, that there seemed to be no line of water communication north of Hunter's island. He recollected the reference made by the honorable Senator from Missouri to the date of the map; for he was struck with the singularity of the objection, and said to those about him at the time, that the map must, of course, have been published before the date of the treaty, or else how could the commissioners have had it before them?

Here the subject dropped.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, without amendment, the bill making appropriation for the support of the army and military academy for the half calendar year ending on the 30th June, 1843, and for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st July, 1843, and ending on the 30th June, 1844.

Mr. SEVIER presented a letter from John Rodgers and others, Cherokee Indians, on the subject of their claim against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. S. also presented certain resolutions, adopted by the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of appropriations to building of forts and constructing military roads in that State: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONRAD presented a petition from George G. Payne, praying allowance for the revolutionary services of his grandfather, by granting the half-pay as lieutenant colonel from the end of the war to the time of his death in 1825, to which he was entitled: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, the bill of the House to change the place of holding the circuit court for the district of Maine, from the town of Wiscasset to Portland and Bangor.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, the Senate then proceeded to consider the bill as in committee of the whole; and there being no proposition to amend the same, it was reported to the Senate, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONRAD, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Roby, of New York; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented joint resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine, instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives from that State, to use their continued exertions to procure the immediate and unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ARCHER rose and said that on Friday last, when the Oregon bill was upon its passage, he had voted in the affirmative, for the purpose of entitling himself to move a reconsideration. He now made that motion.

Mr. LINN inquired whether the bill was in the possession of the Senate; and, if so, by what rule of the body it was in its possession.

Mr. ARCHER replied that the bill was still in the possession of the Senate; and in order to exonerate the officer of the Senate from any blame which might be imputed to him, he felt it his duty to state that he had mentioned to him the fact that he intended to move a reconsideration.

The CHAIR stated that this having been announced, and two days being allowed by the rule within which the motion for reconsideration might be made, he conceived that no blame could properly be attached to any one on account of its detention.

Mr. LINN said he did not think that this got over the difficulty. If such a course were permissible, it would put the fate of questions of the greatest importance in the power of one or two individuals. It could never have been intended by the rule that a gentleman who intended to move the reconsideration of a vote should have nothing more to do than to go to the Secretary of the Senate, and tell him that such was his intention. It was just as easy for the gentleman from Virginia to have given notice to the Senate of his intention. He did not intend to impute anything improper to his excellent friend from Virginia; but he must be permitted to say that he certainly thought that gentleman was one of the very last who would have resorted to a parliamentary manœuvre. It must be obvious to every one that this was not the correct course to be pursued in the Senate of the United States. It was generally supposed that the bill had gone to the other House; and he would venture the assertion, that many Senators never knew of the honorable gentleman's intention until this moment. The advantage, then, which the mover would have, was obvious; he could have his friends about him, while his opponents would have no opportunity of resisting the motion. The Senate would of course proceed, if they saw fit; but he must be permitted to say it was an anomalous proceeding, and which, if followed, would lead to much mischief.

Mr. ARCHER replied. He thought the matter could be set right with very few words. The honorable gentleman from Missouri might be assured that he did not consider him as designing to throw any unwarrantable imputation upon him, or upon any other Senator, in reference to this matter; it was not according to the honorable gentleman's habit to do anything of this kind; and he thought he should be able to convince him that he was mistaken as to what he considered the impropriety of the course which he had taken in regard to this matter.

He was informed that the invariable usage had been, in such cases, precisely such as he had pursued. Besides, it was declared, by a rule of the Senate, that two days of actual sitting should be allowed, within which the motion might be made. It could not, then, be in accordance with what was right, whether it had been the practice or not, that the bill should pass from the Senate until he had had an opportunity of availing himself of the rule. If an irregular usage had grown up, it ought not to be urged as a sufficient reason for setting aside the rule altogether.

But again, to show the honorable Senator that he was mistaken: when was it that the bill passed? Late on the evening of Friday. When was the next juridical day of the session? Saturday was not. There was, then, no day when it could be within the competency of the Secretary to send away the bill. The vote was taken after the usual hour for adjournment. When the utmost degree of impatience was manifested throughout the Senate for an adjournment, it might not have been in his power to procure the consideration of his motion; because it might, at any time, be superseded by a motion for adjournment. The Secretary must stand acquitted; for he had done only what he had been accustomed to do in like cases; and, as for himself, he must appeal to his honorable friend to say if he had not communicated to him his intention to move a reconsideration. Did that look like a clandestine proceeding?

Mr. CALHOUN made some remarks which were but indistinctly heard by the reporter; after which,

Mr. LINN said he supposed there was nothing left for him but to retreat as gracefully as he could. He had spoken more particularly with reference to the uncertainty of the usage, and of the necessity for having some definite and general rule upon the subject. This question of reconsideration was then (it being suggested by Mr. SEVIER that two or three Senators were absent) postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the bill to amend the several acts establishing the Treasury Department, being

THE EXCHEQUER BILL.

The bill amendatory of the several acts in relation to the regulation of the treasury of the United States, was accordingly taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. TALLMADGE addressed the Senate on the subject for about an hour, in explanation of the provisions and probable effects of the bill, should it become a law.

He regretted that he had not been able, before this time, to bring forward his measure. The delay had not originated with him. It was at the solicitation of other gentlemen he had been induced to accede to its postponement. It had been made the special order for a day passed over some weeks ago; but an important measure (the Oregon bill) was under discussion when that day came, and the present bill was necessarily postponed from time to time, with an expectation that the other would be disposed of, so that the attention of the Senate would be more concentrated on this measure. He had made this explanation to exonerate himself from any imputation of neglecting to call it up, and to show that he had acted in perfect good faith with regard to his avowed intention of bringing it forward at the earliest possible day.

The general design of this bill was to do something for the relief of the country in relation to the currency and exchanges. It is, in some sense, the same bill as that reported by the select committee last session of Congress, of which he had the honor of being chairman. The report made by that committee was full and elaborate, containing the views of the members with whom he concurred; and it was so ample and satisfactory, in his mind, as to require little additional argument on his part in its support. He would not, at present, go into details, which gentlemen had doubtless seen in that report. He would content himself with stating very briefly a few leading points, on which the whole question must necessarily depend. Now, as the proposition is to do something for the currency and exchanges of the country, the first question which arises is, Does the country stand in need of the interposition of the General Government? He believed it would be conceded that the condition of the country was such as to require relief. He would not undertake to describe that condition—for his imagination could not furnish him expressions adequate to the description. He could not depict the wreck of private fortune and public credit which had taken place within the last few years throughout the length and breadth of the land. Here is a country, with all the element of prosperity—teeming with fertility—and yet with a people starving in the midst of abundance; distress, poverty, and ruin staring them in the face; while the abundance of our harvests is breaking down our granaries for want of a remunerating market. For all this, there must be some adequate cause. He, and those with whom he generally concurred in political views, felt satisfied that, although there might be many causes, yet the main one was to be found in the derangement of the currency and the exchanges of the country. There might be a diversity of opinion as to the origin of that derangement of currency and exchanges; but there could be none as to the existence of the fact.

He believed most seriously that the besetting sin of the country was, that questions, which in themselves were purely national questions of general interest for the whole community, were made the arena of political strife and the watchwords for political battle. As long as such questions as bank or no bank are made the watchwords of party, derangement of the currency and exchanges will continue, and the consequent derangement of the whole business affairs of the community. It was high time to drop these party distinctions, and think of the distress of the country, with a view of affording such relief as could be derived from our legislation. The first consideration in the Congress of the United States should be, how it can best fulfil its duty to the country. He should not hesitate to say that it is its duty to unite on some such measure of relief as that now proposed by this bill. The time, however, was gone by for asking what ought to be done; and the question now is, What can be done? The people are crying out for relief; they are looking to this Government for that relief. And are gentlemen to fold their arms, and say they can do nothing? Here is a measure which will do something. It may not accomplish all that could be desired; but it will accomplish much. It will afford considerable relief.

It proposes nothing that is not perfectly consistent with the constitutional powers of the Government—powers necessarily conferred on it for the collecting, safekeeping, and disbursement of the public revenue. If, in effecting these objects, facilities for exchanges and currency can be given, it is the duty of the General Government to give them. The provisions of this bill aim at nothing more.

Different modes of effecting the objects of collecting, safekeeping, and disbursing the revenue, in connexion with the regulation of the currency and exchanges, had been tried since the foundation of this Government. One was through the medium of a United States bank; another, through that of the pet-bank system; and a third, through that of the sub-treasury or independent treasury.

Mr. T. entered into a long historical detail of the operation of each of these systems, which he summed up in the conclusion—that a revival of any one of them, at the present time, was hopeless, if not impracticable.

Facts should be taken as they exist. It was not what one party or another wished to accomplish, but could not accomplish, should be considered; but what could be effected. Gentlemen who looked to a national bank, even if all their anticipations could be realized in 1844, would not be able to do anything for the relief of the country for seven years to come. It would take them the next long session after 1844 to get through a bill. It would take another year to negotiate the stock; another to get the bank into operation; and at least another before the country would begin to feel any effects from its operation. What sort of relief would this hold out to the present distress under which the country was bleeding at every pore? Now is the acceptable time to do something. It was demanded now, and it was the business and the duty of Congress to meet the demand.

When this plan of an exchequer came up last session, considerable discussion took place on the question of reference. In that discussion he (Mr. TALLMADGE) did not take part, wishing to reserve himself for an unbiassed consideration in committee, should he be one of its members. The measure had, however, been so fully and so ably debated, that the views of Senators were disclosed at large, and the objections on every side were thoroughly understood.

When, therefore, the subject was referred to a special committee, of which he had the honor to be chairman, it became the duty of the committee to weigh all those objections, and to give to them all the importance they deserved. The bill now before the Senate had been framed and amended with these objections specially in view; and it was confidently hoped by the committee that they had accomplished the task of preparing a measure which steered clear of them all.

The first class of objections related to the Executive power which might influence the institution. That, the committee proposed to obviate by the manner of appointing the commissioners—requiring the sanction of the Senate, and rendering them incapable of being removed, unless on special grounds, and with the assent of the Senate. The principle was further carried out in relation to the subordinate officers.

The second class of objections related to the purchase of, and dealing in, bills of exchange. That provision the committee had stricken from the bill, fully satisfied that it was a dangerous one, likely to lead to abuses of the worst kind. They substituted for it the power of selling bills of exchange for specie deposites; and the power of collecting bills of exchange lodged for that purpose, and payable in specie.

Mr. T. pointed out the advantages which would be afforded throughout the Union by this mode of extending facilities for the transmission of funds from one point to another.

The third class of objections related to the using of the powers of the Government for controlling the currency and monetary circulation of the country, by a currency of its own.

Now he held to the doctrine, that the Government ought not to anticipate its revenues by promises to pay; for its affairs should be so regulated that its income should not only be sufficient for its wants, but sufficient to keep in the treasury a surplus of from three to five millions of dollars, to meet unforeseen demands. And if at any time it is driven to the necessity of anticipating its means, it could be done by the temporary expedient of treasury notes—not to be used as circulation, but in the manner which experience had sanctioned. It should not go beyond its anticipated revenue, which would come in for the redemption of these treasury notes. If it did make use of its credit to obtain a circulation beyond its anticipated means, the country could experience no relief from the excess, because it would only act as a means of driving out of circulation an equal quantity of the medium in operation at the time, or not circulate at all. The committee had therefore discarded from the bill anything like a proposition to authorize a credit circulation. They proposed that the bills to be issued should be only for specie deposited, dollar for dollar. This was to be the foundation of the issues. It might be supposed this would not afford any relief, or, if it did, a very limited one. But he would reply that it must afford very great relief, and of that peculiar and practical kind which was felt to be necessary by every one who had the least occasion to pass from one part of the Union to the other.

Mr. T. here entered into particulars, to show the practical operation. Persons would be able to travel all over the Union with the funds of the institution, transact business anywhere with them, make remittances to or from any point, and enjoy all the facilities which used to be afforded by United States Bank notes.

It was not desirable that it should be a bank to afford facilities for credit, as persons of good standing and credit could obtain the relief of advances on their notes from the local banks, and with the proceeds they could obtain from this institution bills of exchange to make their remittances.

It was his conviction that the circulation it would thus afford would be equal to the average circulation of the Bank of the United States, which was about ten millions. For a long time, it had been but six millions; and, in most cases, it had as much specie in its vaults as it had bank-notes in circulation. In such cases, its operations must have been the same, so far as regarded circulation, as the operations proposed by this bill.

The effect on the ordinary circulating mediums of the States was fully examined in the details of the committee's report, to which he referred.

On the whole, he hoped, when Senators would come fully to investigate the subject, and to view it with a single eye to the relief of the country, they would feel satisfied that, while the measure could not be objected to on constitutional grounds, it would not only (so far as the Government was concerned) effect all the objects proposed, of collecting, safekeeping, and disbursing the public revenues; but it would enable it to perform a duty which it owed to the country—of affording that relief which alone could be given by the establishment of a sound currency and a uniformity of exchanges. Whatever might be the course of other Senators, he, at least, should console himself, under any disposition that might be made of the bill, with the proud consciousness that, in bringing it forward, and advocating it as he had done, he had not only performed his duty to his constituents, but to the country at large.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till to-morrow. Then,

On motion by Mr. MILLER, the bill for repaving and repairing Pennsylvania avenue was taken up as in committee of the whole; and the several amendments of the Committee on the District of Columbia having been adopted, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PRIVATE MAIL EXPRESSES.

The Senate then proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the unfinished business of the morning hour of Thursday last—being the bill to prevent the employment of private expresses upon mail routes, and for the prevention of frauds upon the revenues of the Post Office Department; the question pending being the amendment proposed by Mr. PORTER, to strike out of the second and fifth sections the words "or other mailable matter whatever;" the effect of which proposition would be, if adopted, to permit all matter, except letters, to be conveyed by private expresses.

Mr. MERRICK supposed that the amendment which he introduced on Thursday last, as an additional section to the bill, defining the meaning to be attached to the words "mailable matter," by prescribing what matter was to be charged with postage, would remove the objections of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. PORTER.] This amendment was submitted with the view of removing the objections of that Senator; he presumed, therefore, he would waive his amendment to strike out the words proposed.

Mr. PORTER replied, substantially, that the objection which he had to the use of the words "mailable matter," on account of the indefinite meaning which might be attached to them, might be removed by the amendment defining what was mailable matter. But he had a further objection, which was not removed by the amendment. That objection was, that the amendment compelled persons to deposite in the post office packages of money and manuscripts. He wished to confine this bill, as to what constituted mailable matter, to the limitations of the act of 1825. According to the construction of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads himself, packages of bank notes and manuscripts would come within the denomination of letter postage by the provisions of this bill. Mr. P. said, under this view of the case, he could not withdraw his amendment, or vote for the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Post Office Committee, [Mr. MERRICK.]

He then went into a calculation to show how enormous would be the postage on packages of manuscripts or bank notes weighing from two to three pounds, subject to letter postage, if transmitted 400 miles or upwards. He characterized this effort on the part of the Post Office Department to compel newspapers and pamphlets to be transmitted through the mail, as a new-born zeal brought into action since the passage of the law fixing and limiting the rates to be paid the railroad companies for transporting the mail. By that law, the pay of these companies, for such services, was limited to $300 per mile; the right being reserved to the department to send one ton, or four or more per day, if necessary. Before the passage of such law, the effort was to avoid carrying in the mail so much of this kind of printed matter. But now, the effort was to force it all through the mail, without regard to the additional weight imposed upon those companies, and the limitation on their pay. He then went into some calculation, showing that, notwithstanding those companies performed, in miles, only the forty-eighth part of the whole mail service, and received one-seventh of the cost for the whole service, as stated by the chairman of the Post Office Committee, [Mr. MERRICK,] yet he thought if the weight of the matter transported was taken into consideration, the charge would be found to be not so enormous as supposed.

He then made a calculation in support of that position, showing that, on the road between Baltimore and Philadelphia, a distance of about one hundred miles, and where the pay for the mail service was about $30,000, the quantity of mailable matter transported was equal to four tons per day, (two tons each way,) or 1,460 tons per annum—the pay for which was little more than $1 per cwt. This he conceived to be but a reasonable charge per cwt. for such a distance. It seemed to be the intention of the Postmaster General to convey the idea that those companies received an enormous price for the service they perform. Such was not the case. The annual cost for carrying the mail, he had understood, on the very route cited above, previous to the erection of the railroad, exceeded the present cost, and at one time amounted to $40,000. He then went on to argue that, even if the Government did pay these companies a high price for the service they performed, yet something was due to the States and to the individuals who had constructed those roads for the convenience of the public, on account of the greatness of the undertaking, and the vast and unprofitable outlay of money. He was unwilling to make those roads contribute to the payment of the taxes properly payable by other portions of the country, to sustain the Post Office Department. He concluded with some further remarks in support of his amendment.

Mr. MILLER, as one of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which had reported the bill, felt that it was due to the chairman to state that he had concurred with him not only in its necessity, on the special grounds stated in its provisions, but as a preliminary and necessary step for the other important bills contemplated by the committee—one of which was a reduction of postage. He entered at large into the subject of the losses and disadvantages which the Post Office labored under in consequence of the competition from private expresses, and showed the necessity for putting them down; which he contended could not be effected unless by carrying out the provisions of the bill, as intended to be modified by the chairman's amendment.

Mr. CONRAD, as a member of the committee, also expressed his conviction that this measure was indispensable for the preservation of the Post Office Department. It made little difference whether the question really at issue came up on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. PORTER,] or the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK;] it was still a question whether the competition of these private expresses operating so injuriously to the interests of the department, should be suffered to monopolize the most profitable part of the business, or should be suppressed? He argued at considerable length to show that already these private expresses had made great inroads on the only valuable routes of the regular mail, and that they would continue to encroach till they would also destroy the letter-carrying business, unless this bill were passed.

Mr. WALKER supported the bill by reference to the expenses of the West, where, in consequence of the facilities afforded by steamboat communication from Pittsburg to New Orleans, the Post Office Department must suffer an annual loss of postage on letters and mail-matter of not less than from one to two hundred thousand dollars. It was a common practice for large commission houses to have tin boxes on board these boats, for carrying letters and parcels from one city to another—their correspondents having one key, and themselves another.

A commission house of this kind in Vicksburg or Natchez could invite all their customers to put their letters in their tin boxes; and for twenty-five cents paid to the steamboat for its carriage, mail matter amounting to hundreds of dollars might be transmitted. Five or six commission houses, and five or six rich planters connected with them—having the control of their steamboats, in consequence of being able to freight them—could get all their letters postage free from New Orleans to Natchez, and then to any city on the line of navigation; while the producing classes in the interior of the country had to pay double postage, because the department cannot reduce the rates so long as these frauds are practised.

The debate was continued by Messrs. CHOATE and SIMMONS until half-past 3 o'clock; when,

On motion of Mr. CHOATE, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 6, 1843.

Mr. KEIM presented the petition of John S. Jennings, asking compensation for revolutionary services.

Mr. MOORE presented evidence in support of the claim of John D. S. Arden: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, the petition of Timothy Denore: referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. CLIFFORD, on leave, presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine:

STATE OF MAINE.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolution, signed by the Governor, be forwarded by the Secretary of State to each of said Senators and Representatives.

In the House of Representatives, January 31, 1843:
DAVID DUNN, Speaker.

In Senate, February 1st, 1843:

Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

VIRGINIA RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HOPKINS, on leave, presented certain resolutions lately adopted by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, asserting it, as the opinion of the Legislature, that a representative is bound to obey the will of his constituents, or to resign his seat—declaring that WM. S. ARCHER, one of the Senators from that State in the Congress of the United States, by his votes in favor of a bank of the United States, and for the repeal of that provision of the law for the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, which provided that distribution should cease whenever the duties upon imports are increased beyond twenty per cent., has violated that great principle, and disregarded the known wishes of his constituents. Also, instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives from the State to vote for the repeal of the tariff acts of the last session; to vote against any tariff act not solely for revenue; to endeavor to procure a repeal of the distribution act; to vote against, and use all proper means to prevent the incorporation of a bank of the United States, or any other institution with banking powers; and to use all proper means to procure a repeal of the bankrupt law: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROOSEVELT said that a report had been printed, and laid on their tables, purporting to be the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, in favor of the claim of Joseph Nourse. This was a mistake; the committee having reported against the claim, and this being the report of a single member, which was rejected by the majority. He presumed that it was printed as the report of the committee by mistake, under the order directing the printing of the papers relating to the case. The only way to correct the error, in his opinion, would be to direct the Clerk, in making up the documents of the House, to leave it out.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said that, as the report was drawn up by him, it was proper for him to say that he knew nothing about the way it came to be printed.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to recommit the report; but after some conversation, in which Messrs. ROOSEVELT, BOWNE, and McKENNAN took part,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON withdrew his motion; and the first motion of Mr. ROOSEVELT, to direct the Clerk to leave out the paper in making up the public documents, was put and carried.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the regular order of business, which

The SPEAKER said was reports of committees.

WABASH AND ERIE CANAL.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana, on leave, presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana on the subject of the Wabash and Erie Canal; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COWEN, from the Committee of Claims, to which had been referred the petition of a number of citizens of Philadelphia on the subject, reported a bill to indemnify Amos Kendall for damages recovered against him by Stockton & Stokes, for his decision against them while in the performance of his duty as Postmaster General, accompanied by a report on the case.

The Committee of Claims, in their report to the House of Representatives, made by Mr. COWEN, in the case of Amos Kendall, among other things, hold the following language:

"From all the evidence in the case, the committee are satisfied that Mr. Kendall was governed by a desire to guard the Post Office Department, over which he presided, against loss, by allowances which he believed unjust and illegal. That purpose was adhered to with unusual pertinacity, but not from any design to do injustice to the contractors. It is believed to be important that honest guardians of the treasury should not be permitted to suffer for their fidelity. It is not often that public officers err, as Mr. Kendall did, in favor of the United States; and if those who, in their zeal to save the treasury from unjust claims upon it, are subjected to suits for damages, and imprisonment, for whatever error they may commit, without indemnity or relief, we may well question whether, in all cases of doubt to which the Government is a party, the decisions will not be in favor of the claimant, especially when it is considered that errors against the Government are very rarely made the subject of serious complaint."

The bill having been read twice, Mr. COWEN moved to make it the special order of the day for Friday next.

The SPEAKER said that Friday was already set apart for other business.

Mr. COWEN was aware that the way was entirely blocked up, and that the public business was very pressing; but there was no chance of getting this bill considered, unless a special day was assigned for it. He apprehended that the House, upon an examination of this case, would find that it was one of the strongest that had ever been presented for its interposition. It was a case that only wanted a hearing to insure its favorable consideration, and that hearing could only be obtained by assigning a special day for its consideration. Mr. C. concluded by moving that the bill be made the special order of the day for Friday next.

The SPEAKER said that Friday was set apart for other business.

Mr. COWEN then moved Saturday; but

The SPEAKER said that Saturday was also taken up.

Mr. COWEN then moved to take up the bill now.

Mr. GARRETT DAVIS argued that the case should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COWEN was satisfied that, if the gentleman from Kentucky would turn his attention to the case, he would readily agree that no examination was necessary. There was no difficulty in the way. It was a case in which a public officer had suffered loss by endeavoring to protect the public interests; and, in his opinion, the House should protect such officers from loss or damage. On the first trial of this case, the court being satisfied that the jury had given vindictive damages, set the verdict aside, and granted a new trial; and, upon the second trial, the jury unanimously certified that they were satisfied that Mr. Kendall acted from the purest motives, and in what he believed to be the strict line of his duty.

Mr. J. C. CLARK called Mr. C. to order.

Mr. COWEN went on, and endeavored to explain the case. It was simply this: Mr. Kendall declined to comply with an award of the Solicitor of the Treasury, under the direction of Congress; and, upon a mandamus from the district court, he did comply with it He understood that Mr. K. acted under the advice of the President and his cabinet.

Mr. J. C. CLARK again called Mr. C. to order, and he took his seat.

Mr. G. DAVIS said that they had passed laws to prohibit extra allowances to guard the public treasury against abuses, and the Executive and the public officers had laughed at them. Here was a similar case. A law had been passed, which it was Mr. Kendall's duty to carry into execution; yet he had set it at defiance, and now came and asked to be relieved from the consequences. Now, he thought that it was a proper subject of inquiry for the Judiciary Committee to consider how far a public officer should act on his own opinions in opposition to a law of Congress; and he hoped the bill would be referred to that committee.

Mr. JOHN C. CLARK stated that there were two propositions before the House: one was to take the bill up and consider it now; and the other was to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary. He (Mr. C.) was against both of them, and thought that the subject should be considered in Committee of the Whole House. He did not pretend to say whether this was a just claim or not, but it was due to the members of the House that they should have an opportunity to take this report home with them, and consider it, before being compelled to vote on it. He did not admire that sort of railroad legislation, which would take a bill up and pass it on the very day it was introduced; and he thought it would not be slighting the committee who had made a report in this case, to take it up and examine it in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COWEN said that, being opposed, as he always had been, to the consumption of the time of the House, he would not press his motion, but would acquiesce in the reference to the Committee of the Whole.

The question was then put, and the bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUBARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of George Harrison, paymaster in the Kentucky militia during the last war, which was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Also, he presented several adverse reports.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland asked leave to offer a joint resolution for rewarding the officers who were engaged in the exploring expedition: objected to, and not received.

PORT PENN.

Mr. RODNEY submitted a resolution, (which was agreed to,) directing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of making a suitable appropriation for the repairs of the public pier near Port Penn, in the Delaware river, together with the lands and tenements thereunto belonging, the jurisdiction thereof having been ceded to the United States by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Delaware, passed January 29, 1791, with the express understanding of the General Government, declared by acts of Congress approved August 7, 1789, and July 22, 1790, to pay all necessary expenses to support the boundaries, and repair the said piers, on condition of such cession being made.

Mr. WM. O. BUTLER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an adverse report on the claim of Caleb Atwater.

POTOMAC BRIDGE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to provide for the completion of the Potomac bridge; which was read twice, and committed.

In connexion with this subject, the committee had directed him to report the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House a full statement of the manner in which the several sums of money appropriated for the repair of the Potomac bridge have been expended—in which the sums paid for materials, and to whom paid, the sums paid for work and labor, and to whom, and the nature of the work and labor they severally performed, shall be separately stated. And that he also inform this House whether the officers, superintendents, and hands employed upon said bridge, in its repair, have been paid by the day, month, or year, and at what rate; and whether any officer, superintendent, or hand, so employed, has, during his employment, received compensation for any other public service, and how much.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report on the case of Thomas W. Drewry.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. BOWNE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds—who were instructed, by a resolution of this House of the 30th day of December last, to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings in this city, or of reducing his compensation—made a written report, in which the committee set forth the inexpediency of abolishing the office. They, however, thought the salary should be reduced; but they deemed it invidious to reduce the salary of this officer, without embracing in the same bill the salaries of other officers of the Government similarly situated, which, with the same propriety and justice, required reduction.

He was understood to move that the report be printed, (which was agreed to,) and that it be referred to the Select Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. BOARDMAN said he had a bill on that subject, which he wished to present; and for the introduction of which, as objection was made, he moved a suspension of the rules.

The bill was read, for the information of the House. It was "An act to fix the compensation of the Commissioner of Public Buildings," and proposed to fix the salary at $2,000, instead of $3,000, as heretofore.

Mr. CLIFFORD hoped the bill would be received, and passed.

The House agreed to suspend the rules for its reception; and the bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. FILLMORE said it would be better to put the bill on its third reading.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved its engrossment, with that view.

The yeas and nays were called for.

Mr. BOWNE said the Committee on the Public Buildings, pursuant to the instructions of the House, had given this subject a pretty thorough investigation; and, while they agreed that the salary of the Commissioner should be reduced, the committee were of opinion that it would be invidious to reduce in an isolated case, when the officer was receiving no greater excess of salary than nine-tenths of the officers of the Government. The subject of salaries generally had been referred to a select committee, from whom it was expected that a general bill, reducing all salaries, as far as propriety would admit, would be received; and to that committee they wished this particular case to go, with the report of the committee. But now a minority of the Committee on Public Buildings—nay, a single member of that committee, on his own motion, sought a suspension of the rules for the introduction of a bill in this isolated case, without waiting for the printing of the report just made, and now it was put upon its engrossment, and a disposition was shown to pass it right off. Where was his colleague from New York, [Mr. J. C. CLARK,] who, a few minutes ago, protested against hasty legislation when a bill was before the House, supported by the unanimous vote of the Committee of Claims, for the relief of Amos Kendall?—a bill which the chairman of that committee declared had more merits than any other bill which had been reported to this House. He was silent now; and when a bill relating to the salary of an officer, who was in the situation of nearly all other officers of this Government, was brought in, it was pushed through with hot haste, and was to be passed without any consideration whatever. He (Mr. B.) was not opposed to retrenchment, but in favor of it; but he was opposed to the oppression of an individual when he saw that he was singled out by the malice of one man—he did not mean any one member of this House, or of a committee of this House—but a single man who was out of either, but resident in this city—while others in a similar situation were left untouched.

Mr. HOPKINS said this bill proposed to reduce the salary of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and they had the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE] that the committee unanimously favored the reduction; and yet objection to the passage of this bill came from that gentleman alone, after he had presented a report from a committee recommending such reduction—which committee should have reported a bill to carry out their own recommendation. The House, however, had permitted one of its members to report a bill, and he did not deem its passage, under all the circumstances, to be legislating in hot haste. What did the bill propose? To reduce the salary of a subordinate officer of the Government to $2,000—a sum exceeding the salary of many of the Governors of the States of this Union, and of many of the judges of the States, whose station required talents and energies far greater and superior to those required by the duties of the office in question. At this late period of the session, he thought he should best consult the wishes of the House by demanding the previous question. He however withdrew that motion, at the request of

Mr. BOARDMAN, who, in the course of some observations, said it was of some consequence that this salary should be fixed before the general appropriation bill was passed, as thereby provision must be made for its payment.

Mr. WARD, as a member of the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds, said they were in favor of a reduction of this salary, but they thought it would be invidious to reduce it alone, especially while the postmaster of the House, whose services were only for three months one year, and about six months the next, was receiving $1,500 per annum; and Wilson, who occupied the place of an officer in the rotundo, received $1,500 for walking about there. It appeared to him that those salaries should be reduced also. Now, what were the duties of the Commissioner of Public Buildings?

The fee-simple of the land on which all the public buildings stand, and of all the reservations and unsold lots in the city of Washington, is in the Commissioner of Public Buildings, as successor of the three first commissioners appointed by General Washington. The original conveyances, and the plats of the divisions of the lands between the proprietors and the commissioners, and all the letters, minute-books, accounts, and papers of every description in relation to the city, are filed away in the office of the Commissioner. The books of the squares, reservations, &c., with the divisions of the squares into lots, with the number of square feet in each lot, are also kept in this office. These records are the property of the General Government, and have been placed in a fire-proof office, under the charge of an officer appointed by the Government, and responsible to it for the faithful discharge of his duties. His principal duties are as follows:

To report to the House of Representatives, at the commencement of the session, copies of all the contracts for the past year, the names of the applicants for said contracts, and the amount of their respective bids.

To make to Congress, annually, at the commencement of the year, a report of the manner in which all appropriations for the public buildings and grounds have been applied.

To submit all the estimates for public buildings and grounds to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to be examined and approved by them, before they are reported to the House.

To form all the contracts, and disburse all the moneys for materials furnished, or labor performed.

To have a general superintendence of all persons under him in the employment of the Government, and to pay them monthly the amount of their wages.

To attend at his office to the calls of all persons on matters of business; to make examinations for them; and to furnish reports, papers, and evidence from the records of his office, when called for.

To ascertain the number and value of public lots; to make sales of the same, when necessary; to execute deeds of conveyance to the purchasers; and to account for the proceeds.

To select and value donation lots.

To attend to suits depending between the United States and individuals in relation to the public lots.

To cause regular entries to be made of all the moneys paid away on account of the Government, and to keep each appropriation separate and distinct, and to procure vouchers (at his own risk) that will pass the treasury.

To see that the necessary alterations and repairs are made at the Capitol and the President's House; and that the grounds at each place are kept in proper order.

To take charge of the public reservations and lots belonging to Government; and to protect from injury the buildings, trees, shrubs, enclosures, culverts, pipes, hydrants, cisterns, lamps and bridges; and to prevent the removal of any stone, gravel, sand, or other property of the United States, on any part of the public grounds or lots belonging to the United States, in the city of Washington.

To take an inventory of the plate and furniture at the President's House, when the President's term of service expires.

To take charge of the house and furniture in the absence of the President and his family, and to remove the plate to some place of safety.

To keep in order the iron pipes that conduct the water from Smith's spring, by the Capitol, to the General Post Office, and to the Treasury and State Departments; and from Fountain square to the President's House, and to the War and Navy Departments—a distance of more than three miles. These, with the fire plugs, are frequently out of order, and require much attention.

To take charge of the Potomac bridge; to cause it to be properly lighted; to guard against wanton injuries and obstructions; and to preserve a due police on, or near it, so as to insure the safety of the passengers and of the public property; to appoint three efficient draw-keepers, and to see that they discharge their duties faithfully.

To cause the rules and regulations prescribed by the joint orders of the presiding officers of the two Houses of Congress, for the care, preservation, and orderly keeping and police of the Capitol and its appurtenances, to be enforced by the five watchmen or police officers appointed by him, and who are responsible to him for the faithful discharge of their duties.

To prohibit refreshments to be sold in any part of the building or its appendages, except in such rooms as are appropriated to that purpose by Congress; and that the bills of rates of the restaurateurs (after having been approved by him) be kept pasted up in each room.

To cause the Capitol square and the Pennsylvania avenue to be properly lighted up on dark rainy nights, and when the moon affords no light.

To pay the captain and the auxiliary watch their compensation monthly, and to settle the account at the proper department.

The head of each bureau has under him many experienced and well-informed clerks, who can transact, and have transacted, the business of the office, for weeks at a time, in the absence of the chief, without any public inconvenience. Not so with the Commissioner of Public Buildings. The nature of his duties is such as to require his almost daily attention to, and inspection of, the various subjects committed to his charge.

The Commissioner has disbursed and accounted for more than one million eight hundred thousand dollars within the last six years; and will have heavy disbursements to make every year. More fire-proof buildings are needed, and must be built, to protect from the ravages of the fire the very many valuable papers and documents which are now deposited in unsafe buildings, and in rented houses. As the improvements increase, the duties of the Commissioner are necessarily increased.

Now, while the committee were disposed to have the salary of the Commissioner reduced, they thought, in justice to that officer, who had faithfully discharged his duties, he should not be selected for retrenchment, while others were left untouched. He (Mr. WARD) was in favor of retrenchment; and he hoped and trusted it would go on. He hoped the House would proceed, as he was sure there was a disposition to retrench—to carry it out in the bill making appropriations for the navy, which was partially discussed; and not only in the navy and the army, but in the civil offices likewise; and that the House would not thus invidiously select an officer who had faithfully discharged his duties.

Mr. BRONSON moved to amend the bill, by striking out $2,000, and inserting $1,500; and on this he moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, the main question was ordered, and the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BRONSON] was agreed to; thereby reducing the salary from $3,000 to $1,500.

Mr. ARNOLD was desirous to amend the bill, by appending thereto his bill to reduce the compensation of members of Congress; but he was informed that such a motion was not in order. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. WISE requested the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ARNOLD] to move to recommit the bill, for the purpose of making it embrace all the other reductions which had been proposed—and especially that of the gentleman from Tennessee, to reduce the pay of members of Congress. As he had the floor, he (Mr. W.) would make that motion in the name of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. FILLMORE moved the previous question.

Mr. BOWNE called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ARNOLD hoped the previous question would not be entertained; as, thereby, his motion would be cut off.

Mr. WISE. Will the previous question cut off my motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WISE. Well, we want the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. The previous question was then seconded—the vote in the affirmative (taken by Messrs. WELLER and LINN) being 110. The noes were not taken.

Mr. McKENNAN then moved that the bill be laid on the table.

This motion was rejected—yeas 31, nays 161, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Barton, Bowne, William O. Butler, John Campbell, Staley N. Clarke, Cross, Cushing, Dawson, Doig, Everett, Gilmer, Granger, Henry, Holmes, Howard, William W. Irwin, Lowell, McKennan, Powell, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Sumter, Taliaferro, Richard W. Thompson, Underwood, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Edward D. White, and Wise—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Atherton, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Beeson, Birdseye, Black, Blair, Boardman, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, A. V. Brown, M. Brown, C. Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burke, Burnell, William Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Williams, Winthrop, Wood, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—161.

The main question was ordered to be now put; and the bill passed.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired whether the morning hour had not expired?

The SPEAKER said it had.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the House go into committee, with a view to take up his retrenchment bill, No. 548—[laughter]—the most important bill now before Congress.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] had precedence.

Mr. M. A. COOPER, by general consent, introduced a bill "amendatory of the act establishing a branch mint at Dahlonega, Georgia, and defining the duties of assayer and coiner." The bill was read twice, and ordered to lie on the Speaker's table for the action of the House.

Mr. ARNOLD rose to a question of order. He wished to know whether he was to understand the Speaker as having decided that his motion to go into Committee of the Whole on a particular bill (No. 548) was out of order?

The SPEAKER said that the motion of the gentleman from New York had precedence. He suggested that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ARNOLD] might attain his object by moving to take up his bill in committee, which a majority would be competent to do.

Mr. ARNOLD said he never could get the floor in committee. The presiding officer always happened to be against him.

Mr. GILMER gave notice that he should take the earliest opportunity, when the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, to move to take up the bill reported last session from the Select Committee on the Currency.

The question was then taken on going into committee, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 104, noes not counted. (Mr. ALLEN of Maine took the chair.)

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the committee postpone the further consideration of the navy bill, with a view to take up his bill, (No. 548.)

Tellers were ordered, [Messrs. READ and UNDERWOOD,] and reported ayes 55, noes 79.

So the committee refused to postpone the navy appropriation bill.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The committee then resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the navy; the question being on the amendment of Mr. MERIWETHER, reducing the pay of the officers twenty per cent.

Mr. PROFFIT (who was entitled to the floor) not being in the hall,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON observed that the question before the committee was a very limited one, and should not, he thought, bring on any general debate as to the merits of the navy or its size. It was simply a question of dollars and cents to the officers, and, as such only, should be considered. When the present Secretary of the Navy came into office, he made a large addition to the officers, much greater than had been made in any preceding administration; and the number, therefore, being so greatly increased, offered another reason why the pay should be cut down. If (said Mr. J) you must have so many officers, you must have them at a lower pay. The chairman of the Naval Committee, [Mr. WISE,] in his remarks on this subject the other day, had made a mistake, which he wished to correct. The gentleman said that there was but little increase of the pay of the officers by the act of 1835; and he went on to say, that, if the amendment prevailed, it would cut them down to less than what they received prior to that act. Now, by the act of 1835, the increase of pay, according to his understanding of it, amounted to but little short of one hundred per cent. The report of the Secretary of the Navy of the 1st March, 1842, showed that, prior to the act of 1835, captains received $100 per month, and eight rations per day; and that would amount to the sum of $1,950, which common captains were entitled to. He was aware that, besides this, they had extra allowances for fuel and quarters, &c.; but he apprehended that these emoluments did not amount to more than five or six hundred dollars per year—making, in all, a pay of $2,500 per year. But, under the act of 1835, the senior captain was entitled to $4,500; captains commanding squadrons to $4,000; and captains on leave, $3,500. Now, this showed for the senior captain a pay of nearly one hundred per cent. over the pay prior to 1835. In addition to this $4,500, he receives one ration per day. The gentleman, in his history of the act of 1835, gave the mode in which an investigation was made by a committee of the House into the pay of the officers, and their expenses of living; and said that the naval officers were admitted to the conference of the committee. Now, he apprehended that if the gentleman would call the officers of the other departments of the Government before a committee, to inquire what pay they should receive, he would find none of them disposed to be very economical. He would observe, however, that, at the time the act of 1835 was passed, the Government had so much money that it did not know what to do with it; and hence the liberal scale by which the pay of the navy was graduated.

Mr. WISE asked if he was to understand the gentleman that the pay of the captains was advanced nearly one hundred per cent. by the act of 1835. The gentleman admitted that they received $2,500 prior to 1835, so that a reduction of twenty per cent. would bring them down to where they were when that act was passed. Mr. W. then referred to the English and French services. The pay of British flag officers, [admirals,] was 12,775 dollars per annum; that of French rear admirals, 42,112 francs, or 8,200 dollars per annum.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON apprehended that the gentleman would not contend that we ought to give our post captains as much as admirals in the British navy. It was not the question, with us, what the British or French Governments paid their officers; but the question was, what we should give our naval officers, in proportion to the salaries of other officers of the Government, the services rendered by them, and the rate of living in this country.

In 1835, when the act was passed, the price of every article of living was almost double what it now is, and the country had its treasury full to overflowing. Now, the treasury was empty, and the prices of living were very much reduced. When they came to look at the pay of the senior captains, ($4,500,) they would find that there were very few officers of the Government who received such high salaries; and yet there were sixty-eight or sixty-nine of them, when there was no earthly reason why there should be so many.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia prevailed, naval captains would then get $3,600 per annum, and commanders $2,100. Lieutenants now received $1,800 per year—more than a member of Congress; and he would ask if there was anything in the service of these officers that entitled them to greater pay than members of that House? Compare the labors of one with the other, together with the compensation they received, and it would be agreed by all that members of that House would do well to exchange with officers of the navy. He admitted the importance of the navy; yet he could not agree that there was any necessity for increasing the number of officers to the extent that had been done by the present Secretary. He trusted that the next Congress, when they come here, would take up the navy and army both, and bring them down to a size commensurate with the present situation of the country. The expenditures of the Government never could be brought within reasonable limits until both these branches of the public service were greatly reduced.

Mr. FESSENDEN opposed the amendment at considerable length, and objected to the mode in which the reduction was proposed to be made—in an appropriation bill, instead of a special bill for the purpose, after a mature examination of the whole subject by a committee of the House. He was not satisfied with the arguments brought forward by the gentlemen from Georgia and Tennessee, that the expenses of living were so much reduced below what they were in 1835, that the pay of the officers should be reduced accordingly. He had seen no evidence of this, and did not believe that the navy officers were subjected to less expense for living now, than they then were. He did not believe that the reduction of the pay of the navy was the proper way to correct the abuses in it; and he thought that many of these abuses were more to be charged to the administration at the head of the Government than to the navy. It was the restoration of officers to their rank and pay, who had been broken by the proper tribunals, that tended more to destroy the discipline and efficiency of the navy than anything else. He commented on the restoration of Captain Levy, after being court-martialed four times; and of the evil influence which such examples exercised in the navy. He quoted the opinion of a distinguished officer, that Democracy would be subversive of all order on board a man-of-war; and reprobated inflammatory addresses on shore respecting the navy, which were productive of a disorganizing spirit in the service. He then proceeded with some remarks on the subject generally.

Mr. GORDON said it seemed to be conceded on all hands that in the year 1835 the pay of officers in the navy was very much increased; and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. WISE] had undertaken to account for that increase on the ground that the pay of the officers before that time was insufficient. Now, his recollection was (though he was not a member of this House at that time, and his information was consequently derived from what was published in the newspapers of the day) that the ground of complaint was not so much that the officers of the navy were under paid, as that they were not so well paid as the officers of the army and the officers employed in other branches of the public service. This general recollection of his was strengthened by a document which he held in his hand. He then quoted from that document (which was contained in Gales and Seaton's Debates) the following statement:

"There are now but four captains of the navy commanding squadrons—called commodores by courtesy—who each receive, while employed as such, $100 per month - - $1,200 00
Sixteen rations per diem, at 25 cents 1,440 00
Allowance for cabin furniture - 300 00

$2,940 00
Major general's pay per year - - 8,807 64

Balance in favor of major general - $5 867 64

Brigadier general's pay and emoluments, including fuel at $150 - - $6,048 32
Captain of the navy, commanding a ship of the line - - - - 2,160 00

Balance in favor of brigadier general - $3,888 32

All the brigadiers in the army receive the pay of major generals; and nearly, if not quite, all the colonels receive brigadier's pay; while the sea pay of a captain in the navy, with all his allowances, is per year $2,160
Shore pay 1,930
Master commandant's sea pay, with extra furniture, is 1,350
Shore pay 1,170
Lieutenant's . . . . 960"

This, then, was the ground, or one of the grounds, of the increase of pay in 1835. The complaint was, that they were not as well paid as the officers of the army; but those gentlemen who advocated that increase of pay, did not inquire whether the officers of the army were, or were not, paid too much. There could be no doubt but that the prosperity of the times, the inflation of the currency, and the high price of every commodity, had an effect, at that time, upon the regulation of the pay of the officers of the navy. But now there was a change in the condition and circumstances of the country; and the property and produce of the country were now extremely low, and the means of living were far cheaper than in the year 1835. The country was returning from an inflated paper to a specie—a real and a constitutional currency. They were coming back to the commercial currency of the world, from one of expanded paper promises; and he saw no good reason why the salaries of the officers, which were fixed in times of inflation, should not change with a change of circumstances.

The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs had likewise said that the pay of the officers of the American navy was two-thirds less than the pay of the officers in the British navy; and he went further, and said it was necessary to hold up their pay at the present high rates, that when on foreign stations they might entertain foreign princes. But he (Mr. G.) ventured to assert that the salary of no captain, be it what it might, if he gave entertainment to foreign princes on board his ship, paid for that entertainment. It was somehow made up out of the stores of the ship, or somehow or other—he knew not how it was managed—was paid for by the Government of the country.

Mr. WISE called for proof of that, by the production of a single case. He said he denied that it was so.

Mr. GORDON challenged the gentleman from Virginia to produce proof that the salary of any American officer ever paid for such entertainments to foreign princes.

Mr. WISE said he could inform the gentleman from New York that, by the laws of the United States, a captain could not charge the expenses to this Government of the entertainments which (in the Mediterranean, for instance) a captain must necessarily give to a French or an English admiral who had previously entertained such American officer on board his ship. And there was not a naval officer in our service, who wears two epaulettes, who would not disdain the imputation that they steal the means to furnish their hospitality.

Mr. KING made some observations which were not heard at the reporter's desk.

Mr. GORDON said all he intended was to express his deep conviction that these entertainments were not paid for out of the salaries of the officers.

Mr. C. BROWN said it was on record, from the head of one of the bureaus, that officers in the navy had taken the ship-stores. The charge was made that the officers had used the wine shipped for hospital purposes.

Mr. WISE denied that such was the fact. He knew what the charge was, and it was entirely different.

Mr. GORDON continued. Let that be as it might, he had his opinion on the subject, and he ventured to say that the country had its opinion; and gentlemen might make there what statements they pleased. But did the efficiency of our navy depend on the ability to give entertainment to foreign princes? Was the navy organized for that purpose?

The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs had said it took twenty years to educate a lieutenant for the navy; that they might build a ship in three months, but that they could not make an officer in less than twenty years. But if it took so long, he (Mr. G.) was satisfied that they had duller apprehensions than he supposed them to have. He rather should conclude that the statement was an exaggeration, and a far-fetched argument, to sustain the pay of those officers at its present rate.

He knew it might be said—and probably it had been said—that they ought not to draw a comparison between the pay of officers of the navy and the pay of officers of the civil departments of our Government, because the officers of the navy had our fighting to do, and had to encounter the perils of the sea. But they were now about to regulate the pay of those officers in a time of profound peace; they were not now required to encounter the perils of battle—unless, indeed, the taking of Monterey, and the whipping of our seamen, and the exercise of tyranny over the apprentices, were worthy to be so characterized. The gentleman from Maine had alluded to the case of Capt. Levy; and, from that case, he travelled into an argument against the extension of the principles of Democracy to the navy; and thence deduced an argument in favor of high salaries, because high salaries were necessary to sustain that branch of aristocracy.

Mr. FESSENDEN explained.

Mr. GORDON reiterated the language quoted by the gentleman from Maine, from a post-captain—that the principles of Democracy might do very well on land, but they would not answer on board a man-of-war; and coupled this with the earnestness with which the gentleman from Maine contended for high salaries, that that branch of our aristocracy might ape the manners and practices of the officers of the British navy. That perfect equality could be established on board a man-of-war, he did not pretend to assert; but an approach might be made to it, by a regulation of the pay of our officers.

He wished there was more practical talent in the navy, less aristocracy, and less disposition on the part of the officers to lord it over their inferiors. He wished to see more humanity exercised, and more practical knowledge and experience manifested. He solemnly believed that the navy was now on the road to ruin; and what was accomplishing it? He answered, the military vanity of the officers, which, as it were, sublimated their common sense, and put high-flown notions into their heads. Indeed, he almost began to believe that the navy, as at present organized, should be abolished, and a better and more practical organization brought about. He did not like to see so many midshipmen selected from one State; nor did he like to see those who were bred up in commercial circles overlooked, for the purpose of selecting young men of aristocratical pretensions.

[Here a message from the President, by the hands of R. Tyler, esq., announced that he had signed and approved certain bills.]

As he was saying, he had begun to think that it would be better to abolish the navy, and organize it on a more practical basis. He was no enemy to the navy. He was, on the contrary, proud of it as the right arm of our national defence. He was proud of what it had accomplished—of what it had done; not of what it was now doing. He could not feel any gratification at what had recently occurred on the Pacific ocean; nor was he proud of what was done in the case of Captain Levy, who was tried by a court-martial, and cashiered, but whose sentence was partly remitted by the President. He was not proud of the fact that many of our ships lay rotting at foreign ports. He wished to see the efficiency of the navy restored; and he thought it could best be done by cutting down the high salaries. The pay of the officers was now so high as to produce a combination of influence, which overpowered the Executive. Crowds of applicants were always ready to go into the service; and the consequence was, that the number of officers was continually increased beyond the wants of the country. There were two classes of men in this country: the first were willing to serve their country for a reasonable compensation, and do their duty, for the honor of the places they might have been called to fill; the other class fought for pay, for plunder and the spoils—ever scrambling for places where the pay was high, and always beleaguering the appointing power.

He would again call the attention of the committee to the case of Captain Levy, who was so unjustly treated for no crime whatever. What was the offence for which a court-martial determined that Captain Levy should be dismissed from the navy? A boy on board his ship disobeyed an order, and mocked his officer. Captain Levy—instead of applying to his bare back the cat-o'-nine-tails until the flesh was cut open, and the blood streamed down—determined to shame the boy, by applying a little tar and a few feathers; thus inflicting a less cruel, but much more effectual punishment. The case was passed over by the late Secretary of the Navy; and not until the present Secretary came into office was the matter dug up, and Captain Levy brought to trial before a court-martial. He was subjected to an immense expense, and sentenced to be dismissed from the service. The President interfered, and commuted the sentence to one year's suspension. All this was because Captain Levy resorted to the less cruel and more humane punishment of tar and feathers, instead of stripping the boy, and lacerating his person in the presence of the whole ship's company! Such was a specimen of the manner in which justice was administered in the navy!

But what was the difference between the pay of officers of the navy now, and that prior to 1835? He averred that, in most cases, the pay had been nearly doubled. In 1835, there were four post-captains commanding squadrons, who received $2,940 each. The same officers now received $4,500 each. So in relation to other salaries, he thought a similar elevation would be found to have taken place. But there was some excuse for the increase of pay at that time. The treasury was full, the national debt paid off, the country flooded with bank paper, everything inflated, money cheap, whilst the necessaries of life sold at a high price. These several circumstances combined, made some excuse for the increase of pay in 1835. The reduction of salaries 20 per cent. would not bring the pay of the navy to where it was before that year. Even if the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MERIWETHER] should succeed, the pay of the officers would remain higher than it was before the year 1835.

Whilst he was in favor of reduction generally, he would remark that there were some whose salaries ought not to be reduced. Did he have it in his power, he would so modify the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia as to make the reduction therein directed apply only to officers receiving more than $1,000 per annum. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] had remarked, there were many officers in the navy who actually received far less compensation than the lacqueys of this Government, and of the House of Representatives. He (Mr. G.) wished to restore equality in the pay of those who were in the naval service. The sailor was not, he thought, so well paid, in proportion, as the officer who commanded him; nor were the petty officers so well remunerated as those of a higher grade. He was in favor of republicanism in our navy, and opposed to the infliction of unnecessary punishment. He wished to see the American navy rendered efficient—not effeminated, by officers brought up in the lap of luxury. He did not desire to see or hear of so many frolics given on board our vessels of war to foreign princes and grandees, where our officers would and import them into this country. Too many foreign habits had already been imported—too much affectation already introduced into our society from abroad; and none had had a greater agency in this importation of foreign customs than our navy officers. Gentlemen on this floor were continually holding up the navies of England and France as models for our imitation—yes, holding up the old monarchies of Europe as fit examples to be followed, in respect to their marine, by a republican Government! There was, he thought, no need of our going to Europe, or anywhere else, to learn experience necessary for the management of our ships. There is talent enough in this country for that; and captains enough in the merchant and whaling service, who, in the emergency of war, would be fully capable to take the command of our national vessels. At present, there was no danger of war. The people of this country had the best guaranty of peace with England. They held a mortgage to secure that object, and, as long as the Canadas remained colonies of Great Britain, England would not dare to bring about hostilities. There was no danger of a hostile controversy in relation to our Northwestern territory. So long as we stood up for our rights, we should be able to maintain them, without any obstacle from the English Government.

He concluded by expressing the hope that the amendment would be so modified as to exempt from reduction the pay for those services which had been rendered by officers since the commencement of the half calendar year, and also that the salaries of officers under $1,000 would not be reduced. But, even if these modifications could not be made, he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. TILLINGHAST opposed the amendment. He was at a loss to know whether it proposed a deduction from the pay of officers, or an income tax upon their salaries. He contended that it would be manifestly unjust to make such a horizontal reduction. This horizontal reduction would, it was true, take from the superfluities of one class, but it also took from the necessities of another. A commodore with $4,500 might afford to lose 20 per cent of his pay; but how hard would it go with the midshipman serving on shore to lose $60 out of $300? He argued that though the salary of the commodore might seem high, the highest qualifications and the longest service were required in order to obtain that post. Even the cashier of a respectable bank, serving on land, and with none of the delicate and responsible duties of the commodore at sea, with no lives to preserve, received $5,000. Why, then, should objection be made to the salary of $4,500 for a commodore? Mr. T. then went into a comparison of the pay and emoluments received by the officers of the navy prior to the act of 1835, with what they now receive, in order to show that the increase was not so great as the gentleman from Tennessee contended.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia, after a few preliminary observations, said that he would have preferred taking up the exchequer bill called for by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] before acting on this, in order to see what the House was disposed to do towards providing the means of carrying on the Government. Not that he would have voted for that bill; but he wished a discussion to arise, which would bring clearly before the House the present condition and prospects of the country, before settling the rate of expenditure for an important and costly branch of the public service. No man who loved his country, and who looked beyond the present moment—whether he belonged to the party of the Administration, or to that party which expected to have the management of public affairs—but must feel that the Government is weighed down by increasing debt and embarrassment, and that a heavy responsibility rests on those who have to carry it on. What was the present condition of public affairs? Why, one party was proposing the use of the Government's credit in the form of paper money, alleging—and alleging truly—that the Government could not be carried on with its present means; that its resources were inadequate; and, with the present means of collecting revenue, no prospect of a change for the better. It would be found that they were, in short, driven to one or the other of three alternatives: to abolish the army and navy, and thus reduce the public expenditures; resort to direct taxes; or use the credit of the Government.

He would now ask of the Democracy if they were prepared, when they came into power, to maintain this Government in its present splendid and extravagant scale? Were they prepared to maintain the navy as it was, and, as the gentleman from Rhode Island said, to increase it? Were they prepared to maintain the army and the civil list on the present scale? If they were, he would tell them that this Government could not stand, unless they resorted to direct taxation, or to the use of its credit by the issue of paper money. The alternative must be taxation in some form, reduction, or the use of credit. The imposts were not, and would not be, sufficient to carry on the Government on its present magnificent scale. Taxation upon tea and coffee would not do. How, then, was revenue to be raised? There was an average balance against the treasury every year of seven millions; and in five years the debt would be forty millions. What next? Why, if the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WILLIAM COST JOHNSON] adhered to his project of issuing two hundred millions of Government scrip, the Democrats would be forced into the support of it, unless they reduced their expenditures. Some gentlemen seemed to suppose that the Government could not be carried on unless on a magnificent scale; that they must keep pace with Great Britain in her naval establishment, and be ready to fire with her gun for gun. In addition to that, they were for keeping up their expenditures for internal improvements, for clearing out the Mississippi and Ohio, removing snags and sawyers, &c.; in effect, carrying on a splendid and magnificent Government with splendid salaries. But gentlemen should reflect that all these things could not be done without money; and the question was, where was the money to come from? Mr. C. adverted to the condition of the country at the close of the last war with Great Britain, and reminded them of the arguments used for the establishment of a United States Bank, by which many Democrats were brought into the support of that measure. Were not gentlemen preparing the foundation for the same arguments, and lending themselves to the establishment of a similar institution, by persisting in keeping up the Government on its present magnificent scale? Now, if he were to say that he was for abolishing the army and the navy, as the only means of maintaining the republic, he would be called a radical; yet it was his firm belief that both could be very well dispensed with, or reduced to a very small scale. We needed very few ships, and very few soldiers; and an expense of twelve, fourteen, or, at most, fifteen millions of dollars, was amply sufficient to carry on the Government.

Mr. C., after commenting on the many items of extravagant expenditure which were in favor in the House, lamented that there were Democrats enough on the floor to join with the Whigs to-morrow in voting for clearing out the Mississippi, or Ashtabula, or some other creek, and constructing harbors, &c. If this course of extravagance should be persisted in, gentlemen would be driven to the adoption of the exchequer, or some kindred scheme. For his part, he would say that he never would give up the position that this Government had not the power to use anything as money but gold and silver.

Mr. ARNOLD was glad that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. M. A. COOPER] had given in his adhesion to him, (Mr. ARNOLD,) and that he would vote for bill No. 548. He was not only willing to cut down midshipmen of the navy, and the pay of this House—

Mr. COOPER interposed to say that he had suggested no plan for cutting down salaries, but he said he would abolish offices. He would abolish the army and the navy.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman, then, was for abolishing the army and the navy, before he would allow $2 to be taken from his own daily pay. That was a specimen of retrenching Democracy. If, however, they abolished the army and the navy, the people would abolish that House. Let them then abolish that House, and abolish the Government; and, as a gentleman near him remarked, let every man be his own Government. The gentleman from Georgia was for liberal pay, and no tax. [Laughter.]

He then went on to notice his own exertions to procure a retrenchment in their expenditures; and he confessed that the Whig party had failed him most grievously, and he feared they would continue to disappoint him most grievously. A gentleman near him observed that the Democrats would stick by him, and he hoped they would. A good many Democrats, he would do them the justice to say, had stood by him, and he hoped they would continue to do so; for retrenchment was essentially necessary. What was the state of the treasury, and what was the condition of the revenues? He was told the revenue would not reach $12,000,000. The highest anticipation was but $15,000,000, whilst the disbursements would be at least double that amount, unless they entered at once on this retrenchment. Such was the prospect before them; and yet gentlemen were picking up a solitary case, and cutting down the salary of a single officer (the Commissioner of Public Buildings) one half. This was done, too, by gentlemen who would not consent to put their hands into their own pockets, and take from their salaries even one-fourth; but they took one-half from one single officer, with swelling acclamation. Such a proceeding was disgraceful to that House. He had had a bill in that House, and he had been imploring them to act upon it since an early day of the last session—a bill which would save to this nation something like $4,000,000; but that bill they would not touch. Why? Because it reached themselves. Did they think the country would give them credit for isolated, pitiful retrenchment; while they not only refused to act upon the bill which came home to themselves, but cast reproach on, and attempted to disgrace, every man who sought to cut down the expenses of this House? No; the country would look upon and treat them with scorn and contempt.

After continuing for some time his strictures on the House and on individual members, who advocated all reforms but such as affected themselves, he went on to say that if their pay was not too much now, eight years ago it was too little. And if it was not too much, the pay of other officers of the Government was not too much. In reply to a remark from Mr. M. A. COOPER, he said $3 a day would be a good price for many members on that floor. He then gave notice that to-morrow morning he should contend with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who invariably got the floor; and if he got it, he hoped the friends of retrenchment would be there, and give him the yeas and nays, and not fritter away their energies on little isolated cases. The House owed it to themselves not to skulk the question; but if they were against his bill, let them vote it down; and if for it, pass it, and let their constituents have the benefit of it. He found that in the country, (as he had been informed by gentlemen who had learned the fact during their visit to their constituents since the last session,) men, women, and children were for "Arnold's bill 548," [laughter;] and this House must either take it, or lose favor with the people.

Mr. HOLMES next obtained the floor; but gave way to

Mr. STEENROD, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. FILLMORE reminded the Speaker that there were several executive communications on the table, which he hoped would be presented and disposed of.

The SPEAKER, accordingly, presented a communication from the Treasury Department, in answer to a resolution of the House, (which was adopted on the motion of Mr. MCCLELLAN of New York,) calling for a return of certain fees of district attorneys, marshals, &c. It was referred to the Committee on the Expenditures of the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a communication from the Navy Department, accompanied by 275 copies of the Navy Register.

JESSE HOYT.

The SPEAKER stated that he had received a memorial from Jesse Hoyt, late collector of the port of New York, (understood to be a reply to the report of the accounting officer of the Treasury, charging him with being a defaulter,) which he begged leave to lay before the House.

Mr. ROBERT MCCLELLAN called for the reading of the memorial.

The SPEAKER observed that it was very long.

Mr. FILLMORE said, that if the reading was called for, he must object to the reception of the memorial.

Mr. MCKEON moved that the memorial be printed.

Mr. R. MCCLELLAN claimed the right to hear the memorial read, before the motion to print was put to the House.

Mr. FILLMORE renewed his objection to the reception, and the memorial was not received.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN, in accordance with notice previously given, introduced a bill to amend the act making appropriations for the construction of marine hospitals on the Western waters: read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice of his intention to call up, at the earliest day, the bill in relation to steamboat navigation on the Western waters. He urged the necessity of action on the subject, and stated that prosecutions had been commenced against the owners of eighty-two steamboats, for damages received.

Mr. MALLORY wished to offer a resolution calling for information from the Navy Department; but objection was made, and it was not received.

On motion of Mr. WELLER,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 7, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March, 1803, abstracts of the returns of the militia of the several States and Territories, with their arms and accoutrements: ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, transmitting seventy-five copies of the printed Navy Register.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, transmitting a letter of the Second Comptroller, covering a statement of the appropriations for the naval service of 1842; which, on motion by Mr. EVANS, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented memorials from Hamburg and Wales, in Erie county, and one from Franklinville, in Cattaraugus county, N. Y., urging upon Congress the adoption of the plan for a board of exchequer recommended by the Executive: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE presented a memorial from 210 citizens of Michigan, praying for an appropriation to complete the works begun in the harbor of St. Joseph;

Also, presented a communication from an intelligent citizen of Buffalo, showing the defective state of the harbors on the lakes, and the annual loss of life, vessels, and other property, in consequence; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the latter to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the proposition to print the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents, reported in favor of printing so much as related to the subject of agriculture, and contained agricultural information.

The question was put on the report of the committee, and concurred in.

Mr. KERR moved to print, for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies in addition to the quantity ordered, of that part of the report of the Commissioner designated to be printed by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STURGEON made an inquiry as to whether it was not usual to print some copies of the report for the use of the department from which it emanated.

Mr. KERR said that heretofore it had been usual to print 3,000 copies extra, for the use of the Senate; but this year, after consultation upon the subject, and with a view to avoid any objection to the printing on the ground of expense, he thought it advisable to reduce the number proposed to be printed to 1,000 copies. He remarked that the document was one of great importance, especially to the agricultural portions of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS remarked that the report was a voluminous one, and suggested whether 500 copies would not suffice. Although the information it contained was valuable, he thought that number was sufficient, especially as the newspapers would, in all probability, republish extracts from it of the most valuable portions of the information.

Mr. KERR said that he had consulted with one or two persons in relation to the proper number to have printed. He was of the opinion, himself, that 500 copies were too small a number to be printed of such a document so interesting to the agricultural community. It was seldom, indeed, that they ordered anything of interest to that class, and coming home to their breasts, to be printed. It was not a very voluminous document, and the expense for printing would therefore be small.

Mr. SIMMONS said he merely threw out the suggestion. He did not make a motion to print the smaller number.

Mr. CALHOUN was understood to say that he had heretofore raised his voice against this invention of the Commissioner. It must have occurred to Senators that this officer had regularly taken in charge the agricultural interests of the country, until the department under his control, totally disconnected with that subject, had almost become a home department. If this practice was permitted, by giving sanction to it there, evils (which they did not then see) would soon grow out of it. There was no authority that this officer had, beyond his duties as Commissioner of the Patent Office; yet they saw that, from year to year, he had assumed the charge of superintending the subject of agriculture. If it was not arrested, it would lead to disastrous consequences, which would open their eyes. Although he approved of the objects as much as any man—of disseminating agricultural information, and of doing everything that could be done properly to preserve that interest, he would rather be deprived of a large portion of his income from his agricultural pursuits, than to see this Government becoming the peculiar patron of agriculture, or any other interest.

The question was then taken on the motion to print, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial from Wm. B. Maury, and others, of Pittsburg, Penn., in favor of the adoption of the plan for a board of exchequer; which was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate the laws of the Territory of Florida; which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back to the Senate, without amendment, House bill entitled "An act to authorize the chief clerk in the office of Secretary of State to frank public and official documents sent from that office."

On motion by Mr. M., the above bill was taken up as in committee of the whole; and, being explained by him, and there being no preposition to amend it, it was reported to the Senate, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, without amendment, the House bill for the relief of S. and M. Riche.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, without amendment, the bill to protect the titles to land south of the Arkansas river, held under the New Madrid location, and the pre-emption act of 1814.

Mr. W. remarked that this bill, by some accident, was mislaid in the hands of the committee. It was supposed to have been reported long since. It was the same bill which passed the Senate at the last session; and the committee had reported it back without any alteration whatever. He hoped it would be taken up and considered at once.

Mr. SEVIER also expressed a wish that the bill would be then disposed of; it had passed the Senate two or three times before; but was not finally acted upon.

The bill was then taken up as in committee of the whole, and considered; and there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate, and, being engrossed according to order, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WALKER reported back from the Committee on Public Lands, without amendment, the bill to confirm the survey and location of claims for land in the State of Mississippi, east of Pearl river, and south of the 31st degree of north latitude.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, made a report (which was ordered to be printed) adverse to the passage of the bill from the House for the relief of D. and J. Wilkinson.

Mr. BAGBY, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Charles E. Sherman; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McDUFFIE submitted the following resolutions; which lie on the table one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That it is the solemn and urgent duty of the present Congress to adopt, without delay, efficient measures to revive the crippled and decaying commerce, replenish the impoverished exchequer, and arrest the alarming accumulation of the public debt of the United States.

Resolved, That a modification of the existing tariff on foreign imports, such as will render it strictly and in good faith a mere revenue measure, is indispensable to the accomplishment of those objects; and that the recent measures of the British Parliament, partially adopting the principles of free trade, the public indications of a disposition on the part of the present ministry to extend those principles still further, and the probability of the speedy organization of an extensive system of smuggling on the long line of our frontier, furnish pressing motives to Congress for acting on the subject during its present session.

Resolved, That a rigid system of retrenchment, economy, and accountability, such as will bring the annual expenditures within the annual income of the Government, is not less indispensable; and that, while this is rendered necessary by the deplorable state of the public finances, it is rendered just, and not injurious to the public service, by the great reduction of the currency, and consequent appreciation of the value of money.

The resolution submitted by Mr. BENTON on Monday last, calling upon the President for copies of any remonstrance, or protest, addressed by General Cass, as minister, to the French Government, against the ratification by France of the quintuple treaty, &c., came up in order; but was, on the suggestion of Mr. ARCHER, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, passed by informally until to-morrow, to afford further opportunity for its examination.

The engrossed bill entitled "An act for repairing and repaving a portion of Pennsylvania avenue," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred House bill for the relief of Thomas H. Brown, reported the same back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of Wm. Du Buys, postmaster at New Orleans," which had been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment, was taken up for consideration, and, on motion by Mr. MERRICK, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WALKER, on leave, introduced a bill for the preservation of the collection of the natural curiosities furnished by the exploring squadron, and from other sources; which was read twice, and, with documents from the National Institution, was referred to the Committee on the Library.

On motions by Messrs. DAYTON and HUNTINGTON, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the following bills were taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, and, there being no motion to amend them, were reported to the Senate, and finally passed, viz:

The bill to alter the place of holding the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, by fixing it at Trenton for the future; and

The bill for altering the time of holding the circuit court of the United States for the district of Connecticut.

Mr. ARCHER presented a petition from George Mayo, for certain compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

THE OREGON TERRITORY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted by Mr. ARCHER, on yesterday, to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon was passed.

Mr. LINN demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered: and, the question being put, the Senate refused to reconsider, by—yeas 24, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, McDuffie, Mangum, Miller, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Clayton, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Merrick, Morehead, Phelps, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—24.

PRIVATE EXPRESSES.

The unfinished debate was then resumed from yesterday, on the bill to prevent the employment of private expresses upon mail routes, and for the prevention of frauds upon the revenues of the Post Office Department; the question pending being the amendment proposed by Mr. PORTER, to strike out of the second and fifth sections the words "or other mailable matter whatever;" the effect of which proposition would be, if adopted, to permit all matter, except letters, to be conveyed by private expresses.

Mr. PORTER, after a few explanatory remarks, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MERRICK was very glad the Senator had consented to withdraw his amendment. He went into a lengthened explanation of the reasons for using the terms "mailable matter," and "matter transferable by mail." They had a definite meaning in post office parlance, and no other words could be invented more concise and specific for the purpose for which they were used. They might not convey the same meaning with equal precision to Senators and the public at large; and to guard against misconception, he had prepared an additional proviso to the bill, declaratory of the objects included within the terms.

Mr. PORTER next moved an amendment, to strike out expressions in the provision which he considered superfluous and capable of being interpreted to mean anything and everything—he meant the words "written or printed matter."

Mr. MERRICK said this brought up the whole question, whether private expresses were to be put down or not. If they were allowed to carry "written and printed matter," they would be kept up, and would soon become more formidable than ever. They could not be put down, unless they were prohibited from these sources of profit—properly mailable matter.

Mr. HUNTINGTON was very sorry the Senator from Michigan had withdrawn his former amendment. He argued at considerable length its propriety, and begged the Senator would accept an addition to his present amendment, so as to include newspapers. He was averse to all taxes and restraints on the diffusion of knowledge and information to the people.

Mr. MERRICK assured the Senator that it was for that very reason newspapers should be sent by post. As long as the department had to be at the expense of sending newspapers into every ramification of the Union, no matter at what cost, it ought to be insured the advantages of the profitable routes, as well as compelled to be at all the expense of the unprofitable routes.

Mr. PORTER accepted the amendment, and included "newspapers" in his proposition to strike out.

Mr. CONRAD called for a division of the question.

Mr. HUNTINGTON called the attention of the Senate to a suggestion just made to him—that the prohibitions of this bill would reach to the post-riders commonly engaged in different parts of New England, and perhaps other parts of the Union, for supplying persons in the country with newspapers and other matters from towns and cities, too inconvenient or expensive to be sent for specially. Orders were given to these post-riders to bring from cities or towns, which they visited in their rounds, such newspapers and matters as it was convenient for them to bring.

Mr. MERRICK said it certainly would include all such cases; and if it did not, the whole object of the bill would be defeated.

Mr. WOODBURY did not see why any person should be compelled to send newspapers by the mail. It would do very well for those who preferred sending them in that way; but the compulsion would operate injuriously. As to the compulsion to send money by mail, he pointed out how injuriously that would operate in New England, where the transfer of bank notes for redemption from one bank to another was of daily occurrence, and to enormous amounts. The manner of sending money from one place to another ought to be left to the option of the owners, and free from any restraints.

Mr. MERRICK thought, as long as money was inclosed in letters, it would be impossible to restrain the latter from being sent by private expresses, if money was to be specially exempted. It was a matter, however, in the hands of the Senate; and if any Senator chose to propose an amendment to exempt money, he might do so. He could not, however, give it his sanction.

A division of the question having been called for, the first vote was taken on the proposition to strike out "newspapers;" on which the yeas and nays were called for, and ordered. It was decided in the negative—yeas 11, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bates, Crafts, Huntington, Phelps, Porter, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Wilcox, Woodbridge, and Woodbury—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Barrow, Bayard, Benton, Calhoun, Clayton, Conrad, Dayton, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Kerr, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wright, and Young—27.

The next question was on striking out the words "all written and printed matter." This also was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bates, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Wilcox, Woodbridge, and Woodbury—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Barrow, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crafts, Fulton, Henderson, Kerr, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wright, and Young—24.

Mr. MERRICK moved a verbal amendment to strike out the word "edition;" which was agreed to.

Mr. WOODBURY then moved to exempt "money and bank notes in packages or bundles."

Mr. DAYTON suggested the propriety of including promissory notes and evidences of debt.

Mr. WOODBURY's amendment was adopted.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE again called the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the bill bearing on owners of railroads, steamboats, or other conveyances; and moved an amendment, exempting from the penalties individual owners or corporations.

Mr. MERRICK opposed the amendment.

Mr. CONRAD thought it was not important, as the object was to prevent penalties being levied on sovereign States owning railroads. The General Government could not sue out a penalty against a sovereign State; therefore, there was no danger, from the provision in the bill, that anything of the kind would ever occur.

Mr. MERRICK said the drawers and employees only, in such cases, would be sued.

Mr. McROBERTS spoke in favor of the bill, and pointed out great losses sustained by the department from the competition of private expresses.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE remonstrated against the injustice of making a State subject to penalties on account of improper persons travelling on their property. A State could not exercise the same vigilance as individuals to prevent infractions of the law.

The amendment was rejected without a count.

The bill was reported back to the Senate, and the amendments made in committee of the whole were adopted.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the representatives of Alexander Macomb, Robert Jennings, and the heirs and legal representatives of James Roddy, deceased, sureties of Samuel Champlin, late a paymaster in the army of the United States," was taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be read a third time.

The bill from the House entitled "An act for the relief of Dexter Hungerford, of Watertown, Jefferson county, New York," was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an adverse report of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed; but,

On the motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the bill was laid on the table for the present.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 8, 1843.

The journal of yesterday being read,

Mr. GILMER rose to a correction of the journal. It was stated there that a bill had been referred to the Select Committee on Retrenchment, of which he (Mr. G.) was chairman. Now, he wished to say that no such committee now existed. The Retrenchment Committee, of which he was the chairman, closed its labors and expired with the last session of Congress. The journal was corrected accordingly.

Mr. HUNT wished to know whether the journal was correct in saying that the bill for the relief of Amos Kendall was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He supposed it had been referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER said the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of Wm. Billings and 132 other citizens of the district of Passamaquoddy, Maine, praying Congress to provide by law that all vessels taking fish and oil from that district shall clear the same from the custom-house; and that the shippers shall furnish to the collector certificates from American fishermen of all American caught and cured fish and American oil; and that the shipper or owner of British fish and oil shall furnish a certificate that the same have been lawfully imported.

Mr. HOUSTON presented the petition of Wm. Shoaler and Zebulon Parr, of Lauderdale county, Alabama, praying Congress to pass a law donating to them certain sections of land therein described, for the purposes and upon the conditions therein specified.

Mr. GORDON presented a memorial from 162 legal voters of the county of Delaware, New York, asking for the passage of a law reducing the pay of members of Congress.

Mr. ARNOLD rose and inquired if it would be in order to move to go into committee.

The SPEAKER said it would.

Mr. ARNOLD said he would then move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view to take up his bill, No. 548. [Laughter.]

Mr. FILLMORE asked the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment; to which request Mr. ARNOLD acceded.

TERMINATION OF THE DEBATE ON THE NAVY BILL.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had been requested by many members to move a resolution fixing a period for the termination of the debate on the navy appropriation bill, now in Committee of the Whole. He therefore moved that all debate shall cease on to-morrow, at 2 o'clock, and the committee shall then proceed to vote upon all amendments pending, or that may be offered. He moved the previous question on the motion.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON opposed the motion, and expressed the hope that the committee would not be deprived of an opportunity to debate the bill as it should be. He would also remark, that the chairman [Mr. FILLMORE] might have introduced the bill much earlier in the session than he did, and thereby have prevented the necessity for such hasty action.

The previous question was sustained, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the subject on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion.

They were taken, and resulted—yeas 68, nays 96, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arrington, Atherton, Besson, Boyd Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown Burke, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, Cary, Clifford Clinton, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Eastman, Egbert, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, A. Lawrence Foster, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gwin, Harris, Hays, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, Cave Johnson, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, King, Littlefield, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Alfred Marshall, John Thomson Mason, Medill, Meriwether, Newhard, Partridge, Payne, Pickens, Rayner, Reding, Reynolds, Rigga, Saunders, Shields, William Smith, Snyder, Steenrod, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, and Wood—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Bowne, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, William Butler, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Crawford, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Deberry, Doan, John Edwards, John C. Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, Gamble, Gates, Gerry, Giddings, Gilmer, Graham, Granger, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Lane, Linn, McKennan, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Osborne, Owsley, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Ridgway, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Shepperd, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stokely, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Triplett, Trotti, Trumbull, Underwood, Thomas W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, and Yorke—96.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was carried without a division.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the bill introduced by him (No. 548) to reduce the pay and mileage of members of Congress, and the salaries of the officers of the Government, be made the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia inquired when the bill to remit the fine of General Jackson was likely to come up.

The SPEAKER said that it was in order every morning after the reception of resolutions. The question was now on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] which would require a vote of two thirds.

Mr. ARNOLD called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, on taking the question, resulted in—yeas 131, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, S. J. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Baker, Besson, Blair, Boardman, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Clifford, James Cooper, Cowen, Daniel, Garrett Davis, R. D. Davis, Dean, Deberry, Doan, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Fornance, A. Lawrence Foster, Gamble, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Giddings, Gilmer, Gordon, Graham, Granger, Gwin, Halsted, Harris, Hays, Henry, Houck, Houston, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, Jack, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, John P. Kennedy, Andrew Kennedy, King, Linn, Lowell, McKay, Alfred Marshall, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maynard, Medill, Meriwether, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Newhard, Osborne, Owsley, Parmenter, Partridge, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Reding, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rogers, Roosevelt, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Saunders, Sewell, Shepperd, Shields, Slade, Truman Smith, Snyder, Stanly, Steenrod, Stokely, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Jacob Thompson, Tomlinson, Trotti, Trumbull, Underwood, Weller, Westbrook, Thomas W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wise, Augustus Young, and John Young—131.

Stuart, Summers, Sumter, Sweney, Taliaferro, John B. Thompson, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Turney, Ward, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Winthrop, Wood, and Yorke—53.

So Mr. ARNOLD's motion was carried.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland asked leave to offer the joint resolution, offered by him yesterday, for rewarding the officers engaged in the exploring expedition; and, the resolution having been read for information,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected to its reception.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. WISE suggested to the gentleman to allow the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, who already had the subject before them. This would remove, he supposed, any objections to its reception.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that he objected to the reception of the resolution at any rate; and,

The question being then put on Mr. KENNE-

DY's motion to suspend the rules, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 116, noes not counted.

Mr. KENNEDY then moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BARNARD moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WISE remarked that there was a memorial from the officers of the exploring expedition on the same subject already before the Committee on Naval Affairs; and it was, therefore, proper that this resolution should go there also.

The question was then put on the reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and carried without a division.

Mr. JONES of Maryland called up the motion made by him some days ago, to reconsider the vote rejecting the resolution submitted by Mr. CUSHING, to take the bill providing indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800 out of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUSHING called for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

Mr. WELLER moved to lay the motion on the table; and,

Mr. CUSHING having called for the yeas and nays, they were ordered, and resulted in—yeas 105, nays 102, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Black, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Stuart, Summers, Sweney, Richard W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Trotti, Turney, Underwood, Van Buren, Wallace, Ward, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, and Christopher H. Williams—105.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Goode, Granger, Halsted, Henry, Holmes, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, J. R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, John P. So the motion was laid on the table.

PRESENTATION OF WASHINGTON'S SWORD AND FRANKLIN'S STAFF.

Mr. G. W. SUMMERS now rose, and addressed the Speaker, who recognised the honorable gentleman as in possession of the floor; and all eyes were at once turned to him, and the whole House was at once hushed into silence. The galleries were densely filled with an anxious and attentive auditory, which had collected in anticipation of the interesting proceedings which were about to be witnessed. Many Senators occupied seats amongst the members in the House, and some of the representatives of foreign powers, accredited to this Government in diplomatic relations, were ranged below the bar; and all listened with profound stillness, while the honorable gentleman from Virginia spoke as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise for the purpose of discharging an office, not connected with the ordinary business of a legislative assembly. Yet, in asking permission to interrupt, for a moment, the regular order of parliamentary proceedings, I cannot doubt that the proposition which I have to submit will prove as gratifying as it may be unusual.

Mr. Samuel T. Washington, a citizen of Kanawha county, in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and one of my constituents, has honored me with the commission of presenting, in his name, and on his behalf, to the Congress of the United States, and, through that body, to the people of the United States, two most interesting and valuable relics, connected with the past history of our country, and with men whose achievements, both in the field and in the cabinet, best illustrate and adorn our annals.

One is the sword worn by George Washington, first as a colonel in the colonial service of Virginia, in Forbes's campaign against the French and Indians; and afterwards, during the whole period of the war of Independence, as commander-in-chief of the American army.

It is a plain cutlass, or hanger, with a green hilt and silver guard. On the upper ward of the scabbard is engraven "J. Bailey, Fishkill." It is accompanied by a buckskin belt, which is secured by a silver buckle and clasp; whereon are engraven the letters "G. W.," and the figures "1757." These are all of the plainest workmanship, but substantial, and in keeping with the man and with the times to which they belonged.

The history of this sword is perfectly authentic, and leaves no shadow of doubt as to its identity.

The last will and testament of General Washington, bearing date on the 9th day of February, 1799, contains, among a great variety of bequests, the following clause: "To each of my nephews, William Augustine Washington, George Lewis, George Steptoe Washington, Bushrod Washington, and Samuel Washington, I give one of the swords or cutlaux of which I may die possessed; and they are to choose in the order they are named. These swords are accompanied with an injunction, not to unsheath them for the purpose of shedding blood, except it be for self-defence, or in defence of their country and its rights; and, in the latter case, to keep them unsheathed, and prefer falling with them in their hands, to the relinquishment thereof."

In the distribution of the swords, hereby devised, among the five nephews therein enumerated, the one now presented fell to the share of Samuel Washington, the devisee last named in the clause of the will which I have just read.

This gentleman, who died a few years since, in the county of Kanawha, and who was the father of Samuel T. Washington, the donor, I knew well. I have often seen this sword in his possession, and received from himself the following account of the manner in which it became his property, in the division made among the devisees.

He said that he knew it to have been the sidearms of General Washington during the revolutionary war—not that used on occasions of parade and review, but the constant service sword of the great chief; that he had himself seen General Washington wear this identical sword, (he presumed for the last time,) when, in 1794, he reviewed the Virginia and Maryland forces, then concentrated at Cumberland, under command of General Lee, and destined to co-operate with the Pennsylvania and New Jersey troops, then assembled at Bedford, in suppressing what has been called "the whiskey insurrection."

General Washington was at that time President of the United States, and, as such, was commander-in-chief of the army. It is known that it was his intention to lead the army in person on that occasion, had he found it necessary; and he went to Bedford and Cumberland prepared for that event. The condition of things did not require it, and he returned to his civil duties at Philadelphia.

Mr. Samuel Washington held the commission of a captain at that time himself, and served in that campaign, many of the incidents of which he has related to me.

He was anxious to obtain this particular sword, and preferred it to all the others, among which was the ornamented and costly present from the great Frederick.

At the time of the division among the nephews, without intimating what his preference was, he jocosely remarked, "that, inasmuch as he was the only one of them who had participated in military service, they ought to permit him to take choice." This suggestion was met in the same spirit in which it was made; and the choice being awarded him, he chose this, the plainest and intrinsically the least valuable of any, simply because it was "the battle sword."

I am also in possession of the most satisfactory evidence, furnished by Col. George Washington, of Georgetown, the nearest male relative of General Washington now living, as to the identity of this sword. His information was derived from his father, William Augustine Washington, the devisee first named in the clause of the will which I have read, from his uncle, the late Judge Bushrod Washington, of the Supreme Court, and Major Lawrence Lewis, the acting executor of General Washington's will: all of whom concurred in the statement, that the true service sword was that selected by Capt. Samuel Washington. It remained in this gentleman's possession until his death, esteemed by him the most precious memento of his illustrious kinsman. It then became the property of his son, who, animated by that patriotism which so characterized the "father of his country," has consented that such a relic ought not to be appropriated by an individual citizen, and has instructed me, his representative, to offer it to the nation, to be preserved in its public depositories, as the common property of all; since its office has been to achieve and defend the common liberty of all.

He has, in like manner, requested me to present this cane to the Congress of the United States, deeming it not unworthy the public acceptance.

This was once the property of the philosopher and patriot, Benjamin Franklin.

By a codicil to his last will and testament, we find it thus disposed of:

"My fine crab tree walking stick, with a gold head, curiously wrought in the form of the cap of liberty, I give to my friend, and the friend of mankind, General Washington. If it were a sceptre, he has merited it, and would become it."

General Washington, in his will, devises this cane as follows:

"Item. To my brother Charles Washington, I give and bequeath the gold-headed cane left me by Dr. Franklin, in his will."

Captain Samuel Washington was the only son of Charles Washington, the devisee, from whom he derived, by inheritance, this interesting memorial; and having transmitted it to his son, Samuel T. Washington, the latter thus seeks to bestow it worthily, by associating it with the battle-sword, in a gift to his countrymen.

I cordially concur with Mr. Washington in the opinion that they each merit public preservation; and I obey, with pleasure, his wishes in here presenting them, in his name, to the nation.

Let the sword of the hero and the staff of the philosopher go together. Let them have place among the proudest trophies and most honored memorials of our national achievements.

Upon that staff once leaned the sage of whom it has been said "He snatched the lightning from heaven, and the sceptre from tyrants."

A mighty arm once wielded this sword in a righteous cause, even unto the dismemberment of empire. In the hand of Washington, this was "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon." It was never drawn, except in defence of the public liberty. It was never sheathed until a glorious and triumphant success returned it to the scabbard, without a stain of cruelty or dishonor upon its blade. It was never surrendered, except to that country which bestowed it.

[Loud and long-continued plaudits followed the delivery of this address.]

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS advanced to the seat of the honorable gentleman, and received into his custody the interesting relics.

Mr. ADAMS then rose to submit a resolution in relation thereto. He said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In presenting this resolution to the House, it may, perhaps, be expected that I should accompany it with some remarks suitable to the occasion; and yet, sir, I never rose to address this House under a deeper conviction of the want of words to express the emotions that I feel. It is precisely because occasions like this are adapted to produce universal sympathy, that little can be said by any one, but what, in the language of the heart—in tones not loud, but deep—every one present has literally said to himself. My respected friend from Virginia, by whom this offering of patriotic sentiment has been presented to the Representative Assembly of the nation, has, it seems to me, already said all that can be said suitable to this occasion. In parting from him, as after a few short days we must all do, it will on my part be sorrow, that in all probability I shall see his face and hear his voice no more. But his words of this day have been planted in my memory, and will there remain till the last pulsation of my heart. The sword of Washington! The staff of Franklin! Oh, sir, what associations are linked in adamant with those names. Washington! the warrior of human freedom—Washington! whose sword my friend has said was never drawn but in the cause of his country, and never sheathed when needed in his country's cause!—Franklin! the philosopher of the thunderbolt, the printing press, and the ploughshare.

What names are these in the scanty catalogue of the benefactors of mankind—Washington and Franklin! What other two men, whose lives belong to the 18th century of Christendom, have left a deeper impression of themselves upon the age in which they lived, and upon all aftertimes? Washington, the warrior and the legislator! In war contending, by the wager of battle, for the independence of his country, and for the freedom of the human race—ever manifesting, amidst the horrors of war, by precept and example, his reverence for the laws of peace, and for the tenderest sympathies of humanity. In peace, soothing the ferocious spirit of discord among his own countrymen into harmony, and giving to that very sword now presented to his country a charm more potent than that attributed in ancient times to the lyre of Orpheus. Franklin, the mechanic of his own fortune, teaching, in early youth, under the shackles of indigence, the way to wealth; and, in the shade of obscurity, the path to greatness: in the maturity of manhood, disarming the thunder of its terrors, the lightning of its fatal blast; and wresting from the tyrant's hand the still more effective sceptre of oppression: while descending into the vale of years, traversing the Atlantic ocean; braving, in the dead of winter, the battle and the breeze; bearing in his hand the charter of Independence, which he had contributed to form; and tendering, from the self-created nation, to the mightiest monarchs of Europe, the olive-branch of peace, the mercurial wand of commerce, and the amulet of protection and safety to the man of peace on the pathless ocean from the inexorable cruelty and merciless rapacity of war; and, finally, in the last stage of life, with fourscore winters on his head, under the torture of an incurable disease, returning to his native land, closing his days as the Chief Magistrate of his adopted Commonwealth, after contributing, by his counsels, under the Presidency of Washington, and recording his name, under the sanction of devout prayer, invoked by him to God, to that Constitution, under the authority of which we are here assembled as the Representatives of the North American people, to receive, in their name, and for them, these venerable relics of the wise, the valiant, and the good founders of our great confederated Republic these sacred symbols of our golden age.

May they be deposited among the archives of our Government; and may every American who shall hereafter behold them, ejaculate a mingled offering of praise to that Supreme Ruler of the universe, by whose tender mercies our Union has been hitherto preserved through all the vicissitudes and revolutions of this turbulent world, and of prayer for the continuance of these blessings, by the dispensations of his providence to our beloved country from age to age, till time shall be no more. (Great applause.)

Mr. Speaker, I submit the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the thanks of this Congress be presented to Samuel T. Washington of Kanawha county, Virginia, for the present of the sword used by his illustrious relative, George Washington, in the military career of his early youth, in the seven years' war, and throughout the war of our national independence; and of the staff bequeathed by the patriot, statesman, and sage, Benjamin Franklin, to the same leader of the armies of freedom in the revolutionary war, George Washington.

That these precious relics are hereby accepted in the name of the nation; that they be deposited for safekeeping in the Department of State of the United States; and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the said Samuel T. Washington.

The resolution was adopted unanimously, and with loud acclamation.

Mr. McKENNAN said, as it was evident, after the interesting scene just witnessed, that the House was not in a fit state for the transaction of business, he would now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOPKINS requested the gentleman to withdraw the motion for a moment, in order that it might be stated on the face of the resolutions that they were unanimously adopted.

The suggestion was acceded to, and the resolutions amended accordingly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO moved that the addresses of Messrs. SUMMERS and ADAMS, this morning, be spread upon the journal; and also that a copy be transmitted to Mr. Washington, of Kanawha, Virginia.

The motion was adopted, nem. con.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 8, 1843.

Mr. EVANS presented the following resolutions, which he stated he intended to submit as an amendment to the resolutions introduced on yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] when they shall come up for consideration, viz:

Resolved, That, among the causes which have contributed most efficiently to the depression of the foreign and domestic commerce of the country, and to the consequent impoverishment of the national treasury, and which have thus rendered a resort to loans inevitable, is the want of a currency of uniform value in all parts of the United States, commanding the confidence of the people; and no measure designed to revive commerce, replenish the treasury, and avert the further accumulation of public debt, will be complete or adequate to the accomplishment of these objects, which fail to supply their wants.

Resolved, That another of the prominent causes of the present prostrated condition of the business of the country, and of the public finances, and which has largely impaired American character and credit, which has exposed republican institutions to reproach and obloquy, is the failure of so many States of the Union to provide for the regular payment of the interest on their public debts; and especially the favor and countenance which have been given, to some extent, in some portions of the country, to the alarming and destructive doctrine, that these debts are not binding upon the people of the States which have created them, but may be annulled and repudiated at their discretion.

Resolved, That, while this Congress does not intend to adopt any measures for the payment by the United States of the debts of the individual States, it nevertheless deems it proper, in view of the disastrous consequences to the national character and credit, and to the institutions of republican government, of the failure of the States to fulfil their obligations, and of the principle which has been asserted—that these obligations are not binding on them—to declare, that the debts of the States, created by the legislative authority thereof, respectively, are obligatory and binding upon said States, and cannot be by them annulled or repudiated; and that it is the solemn and urgent duty of the people of said States to resort to the most efficient means in their power for the preservation of their faith, and the fulfilment of their obligations.

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress, by every constitutional and proper means in its power—by the adoption of measures to restore and preserve a currency of uniform value throughout the United States; by the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, and the regulation and administration of the public finances, in such way as shall be least burdensome to the people, and most conducive to the revival of trade and commerce; as shall secure the wages of labor from fluctuation; as shall give security and steadiness to the industry of the country,—to render every practicable aid and encouragement to the people of the several States in their efforts to meet their engagements, and to discharge the obligations into which they have entered.

The resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a large number of merchants and officers of insurance companies of the city of Philadelphia, stating that the growing interests of our commerce in the Pacific ocean, not only in the west and northwest quarter of America, but in the Sandwich Islands and China, call loudly on the Government to establish a regular line of packets to Chagres, and an overland mail to Panama, for the conveyance of correspondence and treasure to and from the Pacific. They ask Congress to take the subject into consideration. Mr. B. observed, on presenting the memorial, that it was strange the attention of Congress had never been called to the subject of the petition before. All communication to the Pacific has to pass round Cape Horn; when it was known that there was a near route, which would save ten or twelve thousand miles. He would be glad, indeed, if anything could be done to effect the end desired by the memorialists; and so far as any expression of his opinion would go to induce the attention of the Committee on Commerce to the subject, he trusted the committee would give the subject their early attention. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WASHINGTON'S SWORD AND FRANKLIN'S STAFF.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, their clerk, informing the Senate that that body had passed a resolution, and had directed him to ask the concurrence of the Senate therein; and had also directed him to state that the sword and cane, which were the subject of the resolution, were also forwarded, through their Sergeant at-arms, to be presented to the Senate.

Mr. ARCHER rose and said he presumed that this would be the proper occasion for making the motion which he desired to make—that the Senate proceed to immediate action upon the subject of the resolution which had just been communicated to them from the House of Representatives.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of this Congress be presented to Samuel T. Washington, of Kanawha county, Virginia, for the present of the sword used by his illustrious relative, George Washington, in the military career of his early youth, in the seven years' war, and throughout the war of our national independence; and of the staff bequeathed by the patriot, statesman, and sage, Benjamin Franklin, to the same leader of the armies of freedom in the revolutionary war, George Washington.

That these precious relics are hereby accepted in the name of the nation; that they be deposited for safekeeping in the Department of State of the United States; and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the said Samuel T. Washington.

Mr. A. then proceeded to address the Senate.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The grounds of the proceedings of the other House, in reference to these invaluable relics, not being necessarily supposed to be known to this body, it may not, perhaps, be considered improper or inappropriate, (coming, as they do, from a citizen of that State which I have the honor in part to represent,) that I should make some brief remarks before committing the resolution to the disposal of this honorable body.

Sir, it is known to all who have read the history of General Washington's life, that he left to four nephews each a sword, one of which had had the signal honor of being worn by him during the whole period of his military services, from the time he entered the army in the service of his country, then in a colonial condition, down to the memorable period when, having achieved his country's independence, and coupled his name with immortality, he resigned the high commission which he bore, and retired to the enjoyment of domestic tranquillity.

Sir, it was a mark of good taste on the part of one of the nephews of General Washington to select, as a memorial of that illustrious man most worthy of being presented to the Congress of the United States, this simple sword. It is a relic of no ordinary value in the estimation of that gentleman, as I am sure it will be in the estimation of the Senate and the country—having been the battle sword of that hero, during the whole period of his immortal career.

Sir, I ought, perhaps, to say that there is no question of its identity, plain and simple as it is; and if I desired evidence to show that it was really the sword which General Washington had worn throughout his glorious career of military service, I would find sufficient to convince myself, at least, in its very plainness and simplicity.

But I will not go into an argument to prove its identity, nor will I trace its history: that has been already done in the other House, by an honorable member of that body, a colleague of mine, who has added, by the manner in which he executed that duty, another wreath to his own honor, and shown how well he deserved to be made the instrument of conveying to Congress this invaluable gift.

Sir, there may be those who think it is unfitting the dignity of Senatorial bodies to pay attention to the preservation of such simple relics as this; but I confess, if there be any such, I am not of the number.

Sir, those who have been the precursors of our course in the great career of liberty, have not been of the opinion that such mementoes were valueless. We have no record of any country, in which freedom has triumphed, where illustrious men, after they have passed from their mortal career, had not statues erected to their memory, and relics and memorials, such as those now lying upon your table, commemorative of their achievements, carefully preserved. They are calculated, in an eminent degree, to produce the feelings and the practice of virtue in successive generations. By associating the memorials of great achievements with the names of those who performed them, and presenting them continually to the eyes of men, they serve to inspire the same feelings which have produced such achievements.

Sir, judging from my own feelings, no statue nor mausoleum can produce so great an effect as the smallest relic which is intimately associated with the person of the benefactor of his country. These are, indeed, small and inconsiderable relics; but who are the persons, and what are the names, with which they stand associated?

WASHINGTON!—when this name is mentioned, who shall be presumptuous enough to conceive that eulogy can add anything to the feelings which the mere sound of it produces? WASHINGTON!—of whom one of the most eminent men living in the present day, and himself the subject of a monarchy, has said, and said truly, that among uninspired men, that was the greatest name of all. And it is, Mr. President; for I must be permitted to say, if it were possible that a man as heroic and as virtuous as Washington should be permitted by a beneficent Providence to be placed in authority now, he could not by possibility be as great a man as Washington was. And why? Because circumstances must, in every case, form one of the elements of greatness. Because no living man can again be placed in circumstances where he can signalize himself as our glorious Washington has done.

Sir, we may have many founders of liberty in every country and in every clime; but never can there be another founder of the liberties of a whole race; and though we should prove recreant to his memory, and treacherously refuse to preserve the mementoes of his fame, this is the character which Washington will receive in all aftertimes, from all races of men. Yes, sir, it is receiving General Washington in a light altogether too confined to claim his benefactions as our exclusive benefactions, and his fame as our fame.

Sir, the thousands of generations which are to spring up in aftertime upon the face of the earth, under the shadow of that glorious germe of liberty which has been planted upon this continent, when it shall have extended its luxuriant branches and brought forth its fruit in full maturity, will all of them claim Washington, as we now are entitled to claim him—as their benefactor, and the author of their liberties, as he has been of ours!

And FRANKLIN!—names associated in this country's history as the greatest benefactors of the human race—FRANKLIN, scarcely less illustrious for his important discoveries in science. Names now associated by the seemingly fortuitous gift of a mere cane!—inconsiderable, indeed, in itself, but of immense value, as having belonged to him.

Sir, the discoveries of Franklin, as a philosopher, (for I mean now only to pay a passing tribute to him in that view,) will hereafter be considered as most extraordinary benefactions to the cause of science—greater than those of any man that has lived in any age of the world.

Such are the names which are here associated by these trifling gifts! And what is it that the Senate is now called upon to do by this resolution? To pay a passing tribute of homage or admiration? No; that is not the word to be employed in speaking of either of these men: it is not homage—it is not admiration; there is but a single word in our language that will express it—the tribute of our veneration.

Sir, it was the simplicity of the style of our venerated Franklin, which distinguished him as much as his eminent virtues, and his profound knowledge, and his glorious contributions to the cause of liberty as well as science. He said of General Washington—the friend of liberty and the friend of mankind—that he deserved a sceptre. Sir, that great man not only merited, but he gained a sceptre. It was thought, at the period of his demise, not too great praise to say that he was enthroned in the hearts of his countrymen. And thus it is that he is destined to be sceptred in the estimation and the admiration of all succeeding ages.

Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate no longer. The inconsiderable meed of praise which I feel proud to bestow upon those illustrious names shall no longer be an interruption or impediment to the expression which I know the Senate is ready to make—of that tribute of veneration so justly due to the benefactors of mankind.

The resolution having been unanimously adopted,

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 8, 1843.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of the inhabitants of the town of Milwaukie, Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress to establish a mail route commencing at Milwaukie, passing through Wauwatooso, Menomonee, Lisbon, and Warren, intersecting a route at Summit, which runs through Piperville and Watertown, to Fox Lake; which last named route was established at the last session of Congress.

Also, a petition of the inhabitants of the towns of Wauwatoosa, Lisbon, and Warren, asking Congress to establish a mail route commencing at Milwaukee, running through the north part of the town of Wauwatoosa, also through the towns of Lisbon, Menomonee, and Warren, to intersect the mail route already established through the town of Summit, to Piperville, Watertown, and Fox Lake, in the Territory of Wisconsin.

Also, a petition of Roxanna Evans, late Roxanna Lewis, asking Congress to make an appropriation to remunerate her for the loss of property destroyed by the British on the 13th December, 1813, at Lewistown, in the State of New York.

Also, a petition of the citizens of the town of Lisbon, Milwaukie county, Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress to establish a mail route from the town of Milwaukie, through the north part of the town of Wauwatoosa, through the towns of Menomonee, Lisbon, and Warren, to intersect the mail route at Summit, through Piperville and Watertown, to Fox Lake; this latter route having been established at the last session of Congress.

Also, a petition of the inhabitants of the town of Wauwatoosa, asking Congress to establish a mail route from the town of Milwaukie, in the Territory of Wisconsin, passing through the said town of Wauwatoosa, on the road established by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory, to intersect the established route at Summit, as established by Congress.

Mr. A. MARSHALL presented the petition of A. Dodge, and 22 other citizens of Prospect, Maine, asking for an increase of the duty on lumber and wood.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a petition from the citizens of Barrytown, and the vicinity thereof, in Washington county, Alabama, praying for the establishment of a post route therein mentioned.

THE NATIONAL RELICS.

Mr. TALIAFERRO submitted the following resolution, prefaced with a few observations, which were inaudible at the reporter's desk:

Resolved, That 20,000 copies of the full journal of the proceedings of the House on the presentation of the sword of Washington, be printed for distribution by the members of this House.

Mr. BRIGGS begged permission to amend the journal before that resolution was agreed to. He begged to move an amendment of the journal, by the addition of the following letter of Mr. Samuel T. Washington to Mr. SUMMERS, accompanying the sword and cane, which were yesterday presented to Congress:

COAL'S MOUTH, KANAWHA COUNTY, (Va.).
January 9, 1843.

MY DEAR SIR: With this, you will receive the war-sword of my grand-uncle, General George Washington, and the gold-headed cane bequeathed to him by Doctor Benjamin Franklin. These interesting relics I wish to be presented, through you, my dear sir, to the Congress of the United States, on behalf of the nation.

Congress can dispose of them in such manner as shall seem most appropriate, and best calculated to keep in memory the character and services of those two illustrious founders of our Republic. I am, with esteem, yours,

SAMUEL T. WASHINGTON.

To Hon. GEORGE W. SUMMERS,
House of Representatives.

The motion to amend was agreed to; and the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia was then adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REYNOLDS then moved that the House proceed with its regular business during the morning hour—namely, the calling on committees for reports.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the navy appropriation bill.

Mr. PICKENS said the order of business had been too long departed from, and he now called for its observance—that committees might report during the morning hour.

Mr. FILLMORE said there was very little time left for the discussion of the navy appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and therefore he felt bound to press his motion.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY inquired what became of the special order yesterday; the House, in a fit of enthusiasm, having adjourned without taking it up.

Mr. PICKENS said, by general consent it was laid aside.

Mr. KENNEDY asked the House then to give him to-morrow for the subject of reciprocity.

After a conversation, in which Messrs. FILLMORE, J. P. KENNEDY, PICKENS, and CLIFFORD, took part, Saturday was assigned for that business.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. PEARCE called up the question of presenting the reports of the Judiciary Committee on the subject of refunding the fine of General Jackson, on which the previous question was moved on a former occasion.

After a desultory conversation, the motion to print was agreed to.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON rose to move a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday, by which was laid on the table the motion of Mr. I. D. JONES, to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of Mr. CUSHING, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to fix a day to take a bill entitled "A bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens, for spoliations committed on their commerce prior to the 31st July, 1801," out of Committee of the Whole, was laid on the table.

Mr. BARNARD denied the power of the gentleman to make such a motion.

Mr. PICKENS said, if it could be done, they might go on reconsidering throughout the session.

Mr. HOPKINS also observed that it could not be done, otherwise their business would be interminable.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON explained; and after a few words from Mr. FILLMORE and Mr. ATHERTON,

The SPEAKER decided that the motion could not be entertained.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to lay the appeal on the table.

After a few words from Mr. ADAMS, the motion of the gentleman from Georgia was agreed to, and the appeal was laid on the table.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ALLEN in the chair,) and proceeded with the consideration of the navy appropriation bill.

The pending question was upon an amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. MERIWETHER,] by which the pay of all officers in the navy was to be reduced 20 per cent.

Mr. HOLMES (who held the floor) addressed the committee at large. He commenced by remarking that he should not enter into the merits of the amendment under consideration. He was well aware that the spirit of retrenchment was abroad in the country. It only remained for the House to determine how that spirit had been excited, and how it was to be satisfied and put to rest. The conviction was now crowding upon us, that a crisis was at hand; and it did not behoove Whigs only, or Democrats only, but it behooved every man to believe himself to be the depository of the interests of this Government. Before the American people he arraigned the present Congress, and he now declared that the Whigs had faltered in the discharge of their duty, whilst the Democrats remained inert. All seemed to be alike indifferent to the crisis which was at hand. He had long foreseen, that when the country came to its present dilemma—when the taxing power applied to commerce failed to furnish an adequate revenue, and difficulties came in every shape—all would shrink from the responsibility when the spectre appeared in terrible array before them. Now, when the expenses of the Government were estimated at $20,000,000, and its receipts at but $10,000,000, gentlemen, instead of calmly viewing the state of things, and seeking a remedy, covered their eyes, and avoided even the sight of the calamities around them. He was convinced that the time had arrived when the Representatives here assembled, individually and collectively, were bound to take heed of the public wants, and when they could no longer go home, and say to their reproaching constituents, "thou canst not say I did it." He felt it his duty to move that all appropriation bills be laid on the table; and that this, as well as others, be not passed, until the House could know what were to be the sources of revenue. He would, therefore, send to the Chair the following preamble and resolution, which he intended to offer in the House at the proper time.

The resolution was read for information as follows:

Whereas the fact is now disclosed, that the revenue of the Government will fall one-half from the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1843, and that the high duties imposed upon foreign imports by the tariff of 1842 have prevented the importation of merchandise to the amount estimated at the time of the passage of the tariff bill: And whereas all the appropriation bills presented to the House by the "Committee of Ways and Means" have been based upon the estimates of revenue furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report at the commencement of the session: And whereas it is highly inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of the appropriations before we have correct information upon the amount of a probable income: Therefore,

Resolved, That this appropriation bill be laid aside informally; and that a committee be appointed to inquire and report upon the probable revenue; to report a bill, arranging the duties upon imports so as to raise the largest amount of revenue; and further to report upon the best mode of retrenching expenses, so as to make the revenue meet the expenses.

The CHAIR said the resolution was not in order.

Several members: "It is not offered."

Mr. HOLMES said he now gave notice of his intention to offer the resolution, and also of his intention to move that a committee be appointed, whose duty it should be to examine into the causes of a failure in the revenues of the Government; to report to the House the proper means to be resorted to, to supply the deficiency; and to report whether it was not proper to cut down—not the navy, not the army, not the civil list—but all and every salary and emolument now enjoyed by any person in the employ of the Government, in a horizontal scale.

The question was now presented, whether we should have a Government such as Mr. Jefferson wanted, and which he (Mr. H.) did not want; or a Government such as the experience of the last war taught us was the most proper—a Government with adequate means of defence. It must, he thought, be evident that we could not carry on our Government with a revenue of $10,000,000, unless we abandoned our navy—not with such a revenue, unless we were content to have a passive commerce. It was needless to think of keeping ships in every quarter of the globe, without a navy to enforce their rights and the decrees of this Government. Now, whilst he wished to sustain our commerce, we had before us the discovery that our means were decreasing, whilst our expenditures were increasing. The resources on which alone we had to rely, were those derived, in the first place, from a tax on commerce, and, in the second, from direct taxation. What was the present position of our commerce? In 1816, our trade was in the most flourishing condition, and all countries were tributaries to the United States. Then was introduced a system of indirect taxation, for the benefit of internal industry. The encouragement given to internal industry had the effect of diminishing imports, and of breaking down commerce. As commerce decreased, so did the duties derived by Government from imports. The failure of the one produced a failure of the other. What was the answer of these friends of home industry, when the prediction was made, that, by fostering it, we should diminish commerce, and lessen the duties derivable from imports? They said, when import duties fail, tax those establishments and pursuits which your policy has reared. The time had now arrived when this prediction was verified, and when, by pushing the tax upon commerce to an extreme, for the benefit of these domestic establishments, the revenue had failed. There must either be a resort to commerce, by reducing the tariff; or to excises and other direct taxes, as held out by the advocates of home industry, when commerce was first taxed for their benefit. But did any one believe that if a tax of 20 per cent. were imposed upon all the iron, coal, cloth, spirits, and other articles manufactured in the United States, it would be paid? Most assuredly not. Were such a measure to be carried, he believed that it would excite an insurrection, in comparison with which the famous "whiskey insurrection" would be but as a small breeze to the howling storm. Could gentlemen seriously think of taxing the wheat of Indiana or Illinois, the cotton of Mississippi, the means of exhausted Maryland? These States could not now support their State Governments. They could, with difficulty, struggle against the weight of indebtedness upon them.

All other measures would be of no avail, except a modification of the tariff and a revival of free trade. However painful it might be to the manufacturers, they must be told that the question was not whether their interests should suffer, but whether this great Republic should survive or perish. The tariff must be brought down to the sole objects of revenue—the revenue point. There was one point, which, whenever arrived at, produced smuggling; and also a point which was too low, because a higher one would produce more revenue. Gentlemen might depend upon it, should the present tariff be allowed to remain in force two more years, there would be little or no revenue at all. He had lately seen a letter from Mr. Everett, our minister at London, in which it was stated that he had ascertained, beyond a doubt, that the most extensive preparations were making to carry on a system of smuggling along the whole of our frontier. He had also been told by a friend who was acquainted with the lake trade, that great preparations were making for smuggling. [A voice: "What are they?"] A large amount of capital had been invested in erecting warehouses, and in the construction of vessels suited to the business. An efficient police was also engaged to further the designs of smugglers, and thereby enable them to bring in goods at a cost of from 10 to 12 per cent. to the American merchant.

He called attention to what the Whigs of the present Congress had done. Did they dream, when they created the present high tariff, that in less than six months the revenue would lapse into one-half of what they estimated? Was it not their duty to propose some mode of relief? They said their hands were tied, and that they had not the executive power. The Democrats contended that they were not responsible, being then in a minority. The Executive could not act, because Congress was not with him. Congress would not, because it was divided into parties. Parties would not, because they were engaged in President-making. Thus, whilst the question with us was, whether a Northern or a Southern man should be President, the Government was gradually going to decay.

He should not vote for any diminution of salaries, unless he could carry out a total reform. He wished members would come to the rescue. The people, he felt assured, would take matters in their own hands, unless Congress should soon act as became it. Congress should cut down the salaries of its own members, as well as the salaries of officers of the Government. Such a measure—general in its character—would, he thought, have a salutary effect. Let not gentlemen talk of cutting down the navy only. Let them not say that its officers were idle and dissipated. Pass this reduction of their pay alone, and it would be a direct censure cast upon them. He referred to the situation of the country during the last war, when dismay was spread over the land, and when the hearts of some of the stoutest patriots quailed at the thought that our country had too hastily entered into a contest with England. Nothing but the achievements of the navy dispersed the gloom, and enabled us to end the war in one blaze of glory. He related several anecdotes of our navy, and also of the British service, in order to illustrate his position, that it was not necessary to the efficiency of the navy that its officers should always be fighting, or, like Nantucket whalers, always on the ocean.

He was, in time of peace, for keeping the navy in a state of efficiency to be prepared for war; and deprecated Mr. Jefferson's Chinese policy, which prevented the growth of that arm of national defence. Did gentlemen expect—with our merchants competing with Great Britain in every clime, in the sale of those manufactures so essential to her existence, and contesting with her the carrying trade, which enabled her mercantile marine to keep up her military marine—that we should escape from the same attack that was made on China, if our navy should be dismantled? Gentlemen from the West, who were so much opposed to appropriations for an efficient navy, thought themselves perfectly ensconced behind the mountains, and as secure from the British Paixhan guns as a tortoise within her shell is from the birds and beasts of prey; but they might find themselves mistaken. He declared it as his belief that, without the protection of an efficient navy, there was not a point in the country watered by our rivers that would not be assailed by British cannon from their steamships, in the event of a war with that power. The Atlantic and the Gulf were admitted to be assailable by all; but gentlemen thought that the mighty rivers of the interior were safe. There was not one of them that was so. Did any gentleman suppose that the British steamships could not run up the Mississippi, and lay the towns on its banks under contribution? Whoever doubted it, doubted the application of means to ends. Nay, more; there were the Northern lakes, which could be covered by British fleets before any preparation could be made to meet them. Gentlemen were aware that ships from Liverpool, of one thousand tons, could now enter Lake Ontario, through the Welland Canal. Suppose a war should be declared with England. Their steamships could go up the canal, take possession of every lake, take possession of the peninsula of Michigan—go up the Mississippi, and take possession of the towns on its banks; and where were we, without a navy, to meet them? What dependence was there on the much-vaunted Western rifle? Why, we might as well attempt to take possession of the rock of Gibraltar with the arrows of the Indian, as to assail one of these mighty engines with rifles.

Now, his proposition to each and every member of the House was this: to put their hands on their hearts, and resolve to extricate the country at once from the difficulties in which it is involved; that a committee be appointed to inquire into the best mode of accomplishing that object, and adapting the remedy to the situation of the country and its resources, without any regard to sectional interests or to President-making. Mr. H. referred to the embarrassed state of the treasury, the deficiency of revenue under the late high tariff, and the growing increase of the public debt; and showed that, without some adequate measure of relief, the country would soon be driven to the alternatives spoken of by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOPER,]—of direct taxation, or the abolishment of the navy and army. Extensive preparations were making for smuggling goods into the country, which would reduce our revenues from imports to a still lower state. Under these circumstances, he appealed to gentlemen to lay aside party feelings and sectional interests, and adapt their legislation to the welfare of the whole country. It was not now a question whether one interest should be fostered at the expense of another, nor whether the people could live under a smuggling trade; but whether the Government should be carried on.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana observed that, from the commencement of this session down to the present hour, it had become extremely fashionable among that portion of the members who were pleased to term themselves the Democracy, to avail themselves of every occasion to denounce the Whig party—denounce their principles, and impeach their motives of action. The speech of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HOLMES,] just delivered, was a continuation of these attacks; and he could wish that the province of defending his party had fallen into abler and better hands. He had, some days since, determined to take the first opportunity to make that defence; and, weak as it might be, he would now make it. It would be well if gentlemen of the Democracy, before they denounced the principles of the Whigs, would declare what their principles were. The Whigs, they said, were the high tariff party, the distribution party, and the bank of the United States party; but what were their principles? There seemed to be a difference of opinion among gentlemen of the Democratic party as to what Whig principles were. One gentleman declared that the Whigs had no principles, and had none in 1840; another gentleman said that in 1840 they had principles, but that they were most detestable and profligate; and another gentleman said that they had one set of principles for the North, and another for the South. Now, with this diversity of opinion as to what Whig principles were, he should like to know whether those of the Democratic party were better defined. If the gentleman from South Carolina was to be believed, free trade was one of the cardinal principles of Democracy. He asked the gentlemen from the North if they were prepared to adopt free trade as one of their principles. The gentleman from New York opposite to him [Mr. McKeon] said that free trade was the true policy of the country; and another gentleman from the same State [Mr. R. D. Davis] was for free trade, direct taxes, no laws for the collection of debts, and the universal rights of man. Well, he would call Mr. John C. Calhoun to the stand—one of the leaders of the Democracy in the other branch of the Legislature, the candidate of a large portion of his party for the Presidency, and, he might be permitted to add, one of the most consistent of the Democratic leaders.

[Here Mr. W. read a quotation from a speech of Mr. Calhoun of the last session, ending with the assertion that the whole Democratic party was rallied under the banners of free trade, in favor of free trade.]

Here he had the testimony of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Holmes,] and of two gentlemen from New York, [Messrs. McKeon and Davis,] that free trade was one of the cardinal principles of Democracy, and, above all, that of the great leader of a large portion of them—one whom he was bound to declare that he believed to be as honest a man as ever breathed the political atmosphere, and, whatever might be said of his changes of opinion on political subjects, there was no spot or blemish either on his public or private character. He alluded to John C. Calhoun, who made the declaration.

Now, he asked Northern gentlemen on that floor, who could deceive their Southern colleagues no longer, if they were in favor of those principles of free trade as the cardinal principles of Democracy? He appealed to the Representative of the district in which Mr. Van Buren, the great leader of Northern Democracy, resided.

Mr. R. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to respond. If by free trade I am to understand direct taxation, I am opposed to free trade. But if, by free trade, I am to understood low duties and low taxation, then I am in favor of free trade. [Cries of "That's right."]

Mr. WHITE said he asked the gentleman if he was in favor of free trade; and that gentleman replied, by asking him what free trade meant.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Well, sir, I will tell the gentleman what I mean, so plainly that he shall not misunderstand me.

Mr. WHITE refused to yield the floor to the gentleman from New York for that purpose. He then went on to observe that the Democratic members were afraid of committing themselves before their constituents; and asked if the Southern Democrats were in favor of free trade, and the Northern Democrats were not, whether there were not in the Democratic ranks, divisions similar to those with which the Whig party had been taunted. He further alluded to the triumph claimed by Northern Democratic presses, which attributed the passage of the tariff bill to the vote of Mr. Silas Wright of the United States Senate; and to the course pursued by Southern Democratic presses, by which odium was piled upon the Whig party for the passage of that same bill; but when the Democrats from those two divisions of the country met on this floor, they were as gentle as cooing doves. He should then assume that free trade was a cardinal principle of the Democratic creed; while, on the other side, protection of American industry was the opposing party principle; and so far the position of the two parties was understood. But he would ask the free-trade advocates, if their doctrines should prevail, how they would supply the deficiency which would be thereby created? Not from customs. Not from import duties. Not by taxing the commerce of foreign nations. They were told there were two courses—the one taxing commerce, and the other direct taxation. If the principles of free trade should prevail, direct taxation would be inevitable; and he would show to the House what the burdens imposed on each State would be under such a system, from a table which he had prepared on the basis of the last census.

The honorable gentleman read his tabular statement, and went into a series of commentaries on the oppressive nature of such taxation, particularly on his own State, which was made to pay the interest of existing obligations. He commented further on the doctrines of particular gentlemen on that floor, and on the inequalities which were observable in the benefits of their legislation between the Western and the Atlantic States, and concluded with remarks on the motives by which he was himself actuated.

Mr. FILLMORE said he merely rose to see if it would be in order to say something about the bill before the committee. He knew that many gentlemen wished to propose amendments; and he had hoped that the debate would have been carried on upon these amendments. The bill must be passed: and, as nothing had been said about it, he would call attention to the estimates from the department, and the appropriations recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means; and, also, he would call attention to a statement from the Navy Department, showing where reductions might be made, without materially interfering with the service. According to the estimate sent from the department, the sum of $4,020,062 46 was asked for as requisite for the naval service and the marine corps during the first half of the calendar year 1843. Now the committee recommended an appropriation of $3,663,978 21 for the same object; thus effecting a reduction of $356,084 25. For the fiscal year from June, 1843, to June, 1844, the department estimated the amount required for the service at $7,318,021 71. The committee reduced the amount to $6,248,079 25. Reduction on the year, $1,069,942 46. Total reduction by the committee from the estimates of the Navy Department during the half calendar year and the fiscal year, $1,426,026 71.

[Several members: "Give us the heads of reduction."]

Mr. F. said he could not now state the various heads of reduction; one item, however, he would state, and that was $500,000 in the item for the increase, repair, and armament of the navy during the half calendar year. The committee also made reductions by cutting off the appropriations for new works at navy-yards.

Mr. MALLORY rose and inquired what rule was adopted by the committee in scaling these appropriations. He observed, from reading the bill, that a large amount was proposed for the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H., and also for Boston; whilst there was very little for the Southern stations—Pensacola and Gosport. He wished to know the reason of this distinction.

Mr. FILLMORE said that the committee acted on the principle of striking out all appropriations for the establishments of new works at navy-yards.

Mr. MALLORY said the reason would not apply in the case of the reduction of the appropriation for Gosport, Va.

Mr. FILLMORE. Why?

Mr. MALLORY said because the appropriations proposed for the Gosport navy-yard did not contemplate new works, but were for old ones.

Mr. FILLMORE remarked that this case, and the remark of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Mallory,] showed how little attention was paid to the concerns of the navy. By reference to the estimates of last session, it would be seen that an appropriation of $36,000 was asked to build a new store-house at the Gosport navy-yard. The committee struck out the item, on the ground that it contemplated a new work. The House acquiesced in their decision, and struck the item from the bill. Notwithstanding this decision, the Navy Department took $15,000, (which had been appropriated towards other objects,) and applied it to the commencement of this new work, for which additional appropriations were now wanted.

Mr. MALLORY said that the explanation of the gentleman did not reach the objection he had raised: it went around and about the objection, without reaching it. Mr. M. was understood to say that the appropriation asked for contemplated the completion of a quay dock, instead of the putting up of new works.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired whether the gentleman had looked into the estimates of last year sent from the department?

Mr. MALLORY said he had not.

Mr. FILLMORE said that these estimates assumed such a Protean shape, that it was often impossible to trace them, and find out for what object the appropriations were wished; but, whenever the committee did ascertain it, their object was always to cut off those which were for the commencement of new works.

As the present state of the treasury had been brought to the notice of the House, he felt it his duty to say something in relation to it. He would call attention to the estimates sent from the Navy Department, in order that the House might see on what data the Committee of Ways and Means had acted. The department had put down the sums required for the several squadrons in the Mediterranean, the Pacific, the Brazilian station, the East Indies, the coast of Africa, and the home squadron; and in another table, it had specified, after carrying out the amount required for all, the sum required for each vessel of a distinct class. Thus, the House might, if it saw fit, diminish the force of the navy as it pleased, by specifying any particular vessel which should not be put in commission. He merely stated this fact, in order that the House might pursue its own pleasure. He was not, however, instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to make any motion having for its object a reduction.

Mr. MERIWETHER rose to ask a question.

Mr. FILLMORE yielded; and expressed a willingness to answer.

Mr. MERIWETHER wished to know whether the bill did not propose an increase of $600,000 above the amount last year expended in paying the navy?

Mr. FILLMORE. Very likely.

Mr. MERIWETHER said he made it $598,000. There was, also, according to his estimate, a surplus fund now on hand, amounting to $490,000, applicable to this object.

Mr. FILLMORE observed that the estimates of last year were cut down. He was also understood to say that the amount proposed to be appropriated by the item could not be reduced, without taking from the officers of the navy what they were entitled to by law.

He would say that a most strange proposition had been this morning submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Holmes,] to lay all the appropriation bills on the table. It was, indeed, a grave charge which that gentleman brought against the Whig party, when he said that they were, last session, disposed to withhold the appropriations for carrying on the Government. It was with surprise that he to-day heard, for the first time, at this late hour of the session, when only enough time was left to act upon the appropriation and upon other necessary bills, a proposition to lay all appropriation bills on the table, and not appropriate a dollar until the ways and means should have been provided. It did seem to him extraordinary that this objection should come from that side of the House to which the gentleman belonged, at this late day.

He would now say a word or two upon the means of carrying on the Government. The only communication which the Committee of Ways and Means had received from the Treasury Department, and the only basis of information on which they had to act, was the financial report of the Secretary, laid before the House in December last. Without enumerating the details of that report, and the estimates of the Secretary, he would merely state that the result arrived at by that officer was, that, on the 1st July, 1844, there would be a balance in the treasury, over and above the demands upon it, of $1,635,871 01.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia rose, and inquired whether the gentleman from New York, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, had come to the same conclusion.

Mr. FILLMORE said he could arrive at no other from the same data.

Mr. WISE said the answer given to his colleague [Mr. SMITH] did not satisfy him. Did the gentleman from New York mean to say that, from the data furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, he could come to no other conclusion? He would ask the gentleman whether he had not looked to other data than that furnished him by the Treasury Department? Was not the gentleman's own opinion different? Had not the gentleman endeavored to form an opinion upon other data?

Mr. FILLMORE said he would take pleasure in answering any questions that might tend to enlighten the members on this subject.

Mr. WISE said he put his questions in all good faith.

Mr. FILLMORE remarked that the Committee of Ways and Means, with the many labors imposed upon them, were necessarily compelled to rely upon the information which they might receive from the Treasury Department in relation to the receipts and expenditures of this Government. The committee supposed that, inasmuch as the Secretary communicated his estimate of the receipts and expenditures on the 18th of December, if any circumstance had since occurred to induce him to believe that he had made a mistake in his estimates, he would have corrected them before this. As no communication had been received from him, either by the committee or by the House, from that day to this, it was to be presumed that his estimates were correct. So far from the committee having received any information that the report of the Secretary was not to be relied on—after waiting for a long time, and after hearing it announced from day to day, in that hall, that the estimates of the department could not be relied on, he, by direction of the committee, addressed a letter to the Secretary on the 31st of January, asking for information. He would read that letter to the House; but, before he did so, he would remark that no answer had been received from the Secretary.

He then read a copy of the letter he had addressed to the Secretary, from which the reporter gathered that he requested the Secretary to state—1st, the amount of treasury notes issued, and when due; 2d, the amount of treasury notes issued, on which the interest is payable semi-annually; 3d, the amount of the loan taken, distinguishing between that taken last session, and that taken recently; 4th, the amount of the loan and treasury notes authorized, but not issued; 5th, the estimated revenue for the calendar year 1843; and 6th, the estimated expenditure during the same period, under each general head. These inquiries were sent by him to the Secretary on the 31st of January. He had since received no response.

Mr. WISE. With all due deference——

Mr. FILLMORE. In addition to this, he would state that, on the same day, he addressed a letter to the Secretary, asking for his opinions upon the proposed modification of the tariff, and stating that the committee were waiting to see what he had to recommend.

Mr. WISE remarked that it was the practice for the House to take the data furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, and also the data furnished by the Committee of Ways and Means, in passing its appropriation bills. Both were responsible, and both bound to inquire into the financial affairs of the Government. The gentleman from New York said that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish data on which to act in making appropriations. He asked, was it not the duty of the committee also to make inquiries? He wished to know whether—as doubts had been expressed in relation to the correctness of the Secretary's estimates—the Committee of Ways and Means had, for themselves, made inquiry into the matter, and what opinion they had formed? He had a right to know their views.

Mr. FILLMORE said he knew not what would be the amount of imports the present year. He could not undertake to make an estimate. But, he would say, that he was not before aware that it was the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to correspond with the collectors of our ports, in order to ascertain what would be the amount of duties on imports. The only source on which they had to rely was the department, which they held responsible for furnishing correct information.

Mr. WISE said he was not yet satisfied. He wished to know the gentleman's opinion upon the data before him.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had already given that.

Mr. WISE had not heard it.

Mr. FILLMORE said that if the data of the Secretary were correct, his result was true—if otherwise, not. After a few remarks expressing his regret that the deficiency in the revenue occurred when there was so little time left to remedy it, he concluded by expressing the hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MERIWETHER] would be withdrawn, and offered, if the gentleman thought proper to persist in it, when a more appropriate bill came up. He referred to the retrenchment bill of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] which had been made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. STANLY read an amendment—which, he said, he intended to offer at the proper time—reducing the number of ships employed on foreign stations, effecting a reduction of about $100,000. Mr. S. then briefly opposed the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, and defended and eulogized the officers of the navy.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia said that this amendment would have no effect; for the officers would receive their pay, whether they went to sea or not.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN observed that, at this late period of the day, he would not say all that he should have said yesterday and the day before, had he then obtained the floor. He now wished to say something in relation to this navy bill, and also to say a few words to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WHITE.] Some gentlemen contended that this bill was not the appropriate one in which to begin retrenchment; that it ought to be done in a general bill, embracing all the departments of the Government. Now, he thought they had better make the reduction here; and if it should be superseded in another bill, there certainly would not be a double reduction. He thought that the reduction of the pay of some of the officers was too great; while there were others that ought to be reduced; for in the bill regulating the pay of the navy, passed in 1835, that House raised the salaries of some of the officers up higher than was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy. The gentleman from Virginia had referred to the neglect of appropriations for some of the navy-yards; but he could show that there was great partiality and injustice in some of them. The appropriation for Portsmouth, New Hampshire, for instance, $40,000 was for permanent improvements, in order to enlarge that yard, and place it on the same footing with others. The appropriation for the yard at Boston was for the same purpose; while the committee had stricken out of the appropriation for the Philadelphia navy-yard, what the department had recommended as indispensable—giving only $4,000 to that yard, instead of the $28,000 which was recommended. This, too, was done, while they gave $40,000 to the little yard at Portsmouth, and $40,000 to the yard at New York; though it was not yet decided whether the improvements were necessary or not. When the proper time came, he should offer an amendment increasing the appropriation for the Philadelphia navy-yard, though he should not be allowed to advocate and explain it.

He would now say a few words to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WHITE,] who voted for taking this bill out of the committee at two o'clock, and yet consumed one hour to-day without saying one word in relation to it. That was a sample of the whole Whig party. They talked a great deal of retrenchment and reform, while their whole action tended to extravagance. They voted for every appropriation, while they declared to the people that their object was economy; and they might tell them, too, how they prevented these Locofocos from consuming the time of the House. If it was not for the hour rule which they had adopted, and the resolution for taking bills out of the Committee of the Whole, debates might go on, and something like retrenchment and reform might grow out of them; but these gentlemen thought they had economized enough when they saved time by suppressing debate. After all, what good had resulted from it? There never was a session in which there was so much useless debate, and so much unnecessary consumption of the time of the House—and all by the different members of the Whig party wrangling with each other. Weeks after weeks had passed in debate, without hearing a Democrat's voice, while the Whigs were denouncing each other and denouncing everybody.

Mr. KING here made some observation, which was not heard by the reporter.

Mr. C. BROWN. Did you not vote for the gag rule?

Mr. KING. No, I did not.

Mr. C. BROWN. Did you not vote for the rule allowing a resolution to be offered to take a bill out of committee at a few hours' warning?

Mr. KING admitted that he did.

Mr. C. BROWN then said that, if the gentleman would put a loaded gun in the hands of a madman, he must not complain of the consequences. Well, the Whig party had accomplished all their objects; and what had they or the country gained by it? They carried their land distribution measure, and the money was sent to the States; but had the people been benefitted by it? They had passed their bankrupt bill; had the people approved of it? They had passed their high tariff; had the people approved it, or had it replenished the treasury? [Here some gentleman asked Mr. B. if he did not vote for it.] The gentleman asked if he voted for it. Yes, he did; and would to God he could have voted for their bank bill, in order that the people might see how delusive were the promises of relief and prosperity it held out to them.

He had voted for the tariff bill as an honest politician, though he did not believe that it would do any good. He wanted it to go before the people, and show them, by its practical results, that all the promises of prosperity held out in its behalf were utterly false. The Whigs had been holding meetings in his district, promising good times, constant employment to laborers and mechanics, and good wages, if they could only get a tariff bill passed. Well, the bill was passed; and what was the consequence? Why, instead of constant employment and good wages, wages were reduced, and numbers were discharged. Such was the result of Whig promises. They had their distribution act, their bankrupt law, and their high tariff; for all of which great promises were made: and now that the country had repudiated them, they were abandoning these measures themselves. Much had been said about the currency; and he would ask if there was not enough for the greatest advocate of a paper currency in the exchequer bill before the House? Would the Whig party go before the people, and say that they wanted more currency than this bill would give them? Or would they go before the people, and say that the paper of a national bank would be a better currency than the paper of the exchequer founded on the revenues of the Government and the public lands? The Whig party had everything they wanted; and, with all their objects accomplished, what had been the verdict of the people? Where, in this vast republic, had they been able to keep their ground?

[Some one answered Mr. B: "In Georgia."]

He had heard it said, when, at the last election for members to the next Congress in Georgia, the entire Whig delegation was defeated, that their defeat was caused by General Apathy. Now that they had been able to get one crumb of comfort by the election of one member for the tail of the session, they hailed it as a great triumph and a glorious victory. But might not that result have been caused by General Apathy also? He would ask any gentleman from Georgia to rise in his place, and say that the result of that election was caused by a single measure of this session. Was this gentleman [Mr. CRAWFORD] elected to make a national bank? Was he elected to perpetuate the high tariff? He had not seen the gentleman's votes yet; but he would vote differently from the Whigs of his section of the country if he voted for any of these measures. Now for retrenchment; for nothing was more potent at the last elections than that subject. There was not a district in this Union in which the Whig candidates did not go before the people upon the extravagant expenditures of the last Administration. Everywhere they imputed to that Administration extravagant waste of the public money, and high salaries. Now, let them put their hands on a single retrenchment they had effected. Why, so notorious was their opposition to retrenchment, that the member from Tennessee, one of their party, [Mr. ARNOLD,] admitted that he principally relied on the Democrats to carry his bill through, (No. 548.)

Yesterday, it was true, they punished one solitary man by cutting off half his salary; and last session, the only man they reduced was the man who carries wood and brings water. They did not reduce the pay of the pages, as was alleged. If they knew of any extravagance in the Government, it was their duty, as honest men, to put an end to it when they got into power. But they had not done so. Let them but show a general movement at retrenchment and reform, and he would answer for Democrats enough to enable them to carry it through. Where would they begin retrenchment, he asked them, if this bill was not the place for it? The bill of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD's No 548,] they said was not the place for it; and now, within three weeks of the close of the session, it was too late to introduce another bill. The gentleman from Indiana said that they went for reform; but he should like to know what their reform was.

Mr. PROFFIT. To get such men as you out of Congress.

Mr. C. BROWN in continuation. Yes, it was; but gentlemen, in striving to get us out, got themselves out of Congress; they dug a pit for us, which they fell into themselves.

There were but few Whig members in the House who would not be repudiated by their constituents. They had been, and were being, reformed out themselves; and this was, in his opinion, the best reform that could be made. Their days were numbered; and, in a short month, all that would be left of them and their reign, would be a blotted page on the records of these halls, and a debt of some thirty or forty millions of dollars, that they had, by their wasteful extravagance, imposed upon the people they had deceived and betrayed.

It had been said that it was necessary to give high pay in the navy, in order to get good officers; but all this was idle talk. We had as good, if not better officers, with one half the pay as we have now. It was the officers who received only half the pay of those of the present day, who gave the navy its high character; and it was on the deeds of those officers that those of the present day now relied to sustain them. He would say nothing in regard to the state of the treasury, further than that in these times of public distress, those in the service of the public should bear a portion of that distress. This doctrine was carried out in his State, by taxing all the public officers; and in Alabama, as he had lately seen, in curtailing the salaries of all the officers of the State 20 per cent. One of the post-captains of the navy told him that he saved more of his pay when he was a lieutenant, receiving only $700 per year, than he now did. [Some gentleman was heard to say that the officer must then have been a bachelor.] No, he was not a bachelor. He would not do such discredit to the ladies of the country, as to consider them a bill of expense. The Scriptures told them woman was made a helpmate for man; and such he had always considered a good wife. At least such a help he should consider a wife, if he ever was so fortunate as to get one, and not a subject of expense, that would require the bounty of his country to enable him to support. They slandered the ladies of the Union, who thus brought them into its halls of legislation as burdens upon its officers or its treasury. They deserved and held a higher position, and would scorn to be thus made an argument to extract money from the public coffers; and, most of all, when those coffers were empty.

The hour fixed to terminate debate having arrived, the committee proceeded to act upon the amendments.

Tellers were demanded on the amendment offered by Mr. MERIWETHER, which was in the following words:

Add to the first section this proviso:
Provided, That, until otherwise directed by law, no part of the present, or any future appropriations for the pay of commissioned, warrant, and petty officers, including the engineer corps, shall be paid to the same, except upon a reduction of the present pay at and after the rate of twenty per cent. per annum.

Mr. C. BROWN and Mr. T. J. CAMPBELL were the tellers appointed; and they reported 74 in the affirmative, and 82 in the negative.

Mr. McKEON then submitted his amendment to the first item, which, on Saturday last, he offered as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, providing that no part of this appropriation shall be applied to the pay of officers, or to the equipping of vessels, to be employed on the coast of Africa, under the late treaty with England.

After a discussion on the appropriateness of this amendment as an amendment to the first item, in which Mr. GRANGER, Mr. WISE, Mr. SMITH of Virginia, and the CHAIRMAN took part, it was decided to be in order.

Tellers were then called for, and ordered.

Mr. ADAMS inquired whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. McKEON] meant to make an appropriation which would be necessary to carry out a treaty, for the support of a squadron on the African coast, by an addition to this bill. [Cries of "Order"—"No debate."]

Mr. McKEON inquired if it would be in order to reply to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN replied in the negative.

Mr. BARTON and Mr. HOUSTON were then appointed tellers; and they reported 23 in the affirmative. The negative was not counted, and the amendment was deemed lost.

Mr. STANLY moved to amend by striking out $2,993,161 as the appropriation for the pay of the officers and men, and inserting $2,715,805.

Tellers were called for, and Messrs. BOARDMAN and WELLER were appointed; and they reported 73 in the affirmative, and 93 in the negative. The amendment was, therefore, agreed to.

Mr. AYCRIGG moved to amend a subsequent item, by striking out "engineer corps," and inserting "engineer men;" which was agreed to.

Mr. STANLY submitted an amendment to the item making appropriation for the provisions of the navy, transportation, cooperage, &c., which was understood to be a reduction of the appropriation for Provisions; but its precise purport was not heard. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY offered an amendment to an item of the bill, for the purpose of providing that the duties of the head of the Bureau of Clothing and Provisions should be discharged by a captain in the navy.

Mr. KING moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the word "captain," and inserting "purser."

Tellers were called for, and Messrs. GORDON and J. C. EDWARDS were appointed; and they reported 79 in the affirmative, and 81 in the negative. The amendment to the amendment was not, therefore, agreed to. The amendment was then adopted as submitted by Mr. MALLORY.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to strike out the appropriation for clothing, &c., $380,000. Rejected.

The clause making an appropriation for medicine, medical attendance, care of the sick, &c., having been read,

Mr. FILLMORE offered a verbal amendment, uniting the appropriation for the several objects intoone item—$57,250 for the half calendar year, and $46,840 for the fiscal year.

Mr. FESSENDEN rose and offered an amendment to this amendment, to be inserted by way of proviso. It provided that no person shall hold the place of chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, unless he shall have been at least five years in the sea service.

The question was taken upon this proviso, and it was adopted without a division. Before the fact, however, was announced to the committee by the Chair,

Mr. ADAMS rose to a question of order. He contended that the amendment abridged the power of appointment lodged in the President by the Constitution, by requiring the President to select only from a certain class of men in the service.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL said the amendment involved a change of the organic laws, and would essentially alter the qualifications required of officers.

Mr. ADAMS said it would have the effect of dismissing the present chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery.

[Several members: "Yes; that's what we want."]

The CHAIR then decided that the amendment was not in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN took an appeal.

Mr. WISE wished to know if the Chair had not, a short time since, entertained a proposition to the effect that none but a post-captain should occupy the place of chief of the Bureau of Clothing? Why, then, object to receiving this proposition?

The CHAIRMAN said he should have no objection to having his decision reversed.

Mr. BOTTS and several gentlemen rose to debate the question of order; but were ruled out of order.

The decision of the Chair was then reversed, and the amendment of Mr. FESSENDEN carried without a division. Mr. FILLMORE's amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS offered an amendment appropriating $5,000 to the relief of recaptured Africans on the coast of Africa: agreed to.

Mr. LEVY moved to reduce the appropriation for the equipment, &c. of the navy, by taking therefrom $50,000: rejected without a count.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to increase the appropriation for the navy-yard at Brooklyn, for the half calendar year, from $14,000 to $16,000; and for the fiscal year, from $22,900 to $25,400; so as to provide for the guard-house: agreed to—ayes 73, noes 52

Mr. CHARLES BROWN moved to increase the appropriation for the navy-yard at Philadelphia, for the half calendar year, from $1,950 to $8,000; and for the fiscal year, from $2,000 to $20,000: rejected without a division.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to increase the appropriation for the navy-yard at Gosport, Va. so as to provide for the guard-house. Instead of $4,000, as proposed for the half calendar year, he moved to insert $5,200.

Mr. MALLORY moved to amend this amendment, by striking out $5,200 and inserting $24,000. (A voice: "That's modest.") The proposition was rejected.

Mr. FILLMORE's amendment was then adopted; as also a similar one offered by him for increasing the appropriation for the fiscal year from $8,500 to $9,310.

Mr. FILLMORE next moved to increase the appropriation for the Pensacola navy-yard, so as to provide for the guard-house there, by inserting $3,000 in lieu of $2,000 for the half calendar year.

Mr. LEVY moved to amend the amendment, by striking out $3,000, and inserting $28,000: rejected.

Mr. FILLMORE's amendment was then adopted, together with a similar one, increasing the appropriation for the fiscal year from $3,000, to $4,047, after a fruitless effort on the part of Mr. LEVY to increase the last named item to $63,000.

Mr. LEVY moved to insert $50,000 for a floating dock at Pensacola: rejected without a count.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to insert an item of $1,000 for printing and publishing the code of rules and regulations for the government of the navy, prepared by the Secretary, under the order of Congress, so soon as the same shall have been ratified by both Houses: agreed to.

Mr. GAVE JOHNSON moved an amendment to strike out the word "increase" in the thirty-seventh line; so that the appropriation should not be made for the increase of the navy: rejected.

Mr. BURNELL offered an amendment providing that naval apprentices, upon being recommended by their teachers and commanders as fit for the appointment, may be appointed midshipmen: rejected.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the committee then rose and reported the bill, as amended, to the House.

Mr. KING rose, and was about addressing the House; but after some conversation between him and Messrs. WISE and MERIWETHER, he agreed to forego his speech for this occasion, and to move the previous question.

The previous question being seconded, and the main question ordered,

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON expressed a wish to have the amendments printed; and, for that purpose, moved an adjournment: rejected.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, and carried.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to report it with an amendment reducing the salaries of all the officers of the navy twenty per cent.

Mr. WISE moved the previous question.

Mr. BURNELL said it was not in order for a gentleman to rise and move the previous question after a gentleman had submitted a resolution, and before it had been received by the Chair.

Mr. WISE explained.

Mr. MERIWETHER said it was his intention to have debated the question of recommitment. He was occupying the floor, when the gentleman from Virginia stepped in between him and the Chair, before his proposition had even been read; and he denied the competency of the gentleman from Virginia to pursue such a course.

Mr. WISE, Mr. MERIWETHER, and the SPEAKER explained.

The previous question was then seconded—88 voting in the affirmative, and 63 in the negative.

The main question was then ordered to be put, and the bill was passed. To prevent debate hereafter, Mr. FILLMORE moved a reconsideration, on which he demanded the previous question. The previous question was sustained, and the motion to reconsider was negatived.

The House then adjourned.

The report was ordered to be printed, and to lie on the table for the present.

Mr. H., from the same committee, to which had been referred the resolution of the 27th December last, directing that committee to inquire into the state of our tonnage, freights, and commerce, and several memorials relating thereto, and to report whether they were prosperous under our existing regulations with foreign powers, and whether the regulations by other Governments are equal and in conformity to the spirit of our treaties with such powers, and what measures were necessary and proper to produce greater reciprocity, reported a resolution, recommending that the committee be discharged from the subject; and that the same be referred to the Secretary of State, who is directed thereby to make the inquiries touching the matter, and to report to the Senate at the next session of Congress.

On motion by Mr. BAGBY, the papers of Jamison and Williamson were ordered to be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KING presented joint resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Alabama, setting forth that, owing to the peculiar condition of the banks, the individuals entitled to pre-emption rights on the public lands find it utterly impossible to procure specie to make a purchase of those lands without great sacrifice, &c., and recommending the passage of a law by Congress to permit the registers and receivers of that State to receive from the actual settler on the public lands, in payment of their homes and cultivation, entered by them under any of the pre-emption laws, the notes of the Bank of the State of Alabama and its branches to an amount equal to the two per cent. fund relinquished to that State by Congress, remaining ed while pending before them, passed "An act supplementary to an act to incorporate the subscribers to the Mississippi Union Bank;" wherein, under the magic title of "supplement," they endeavored to do indirectly what the conscience of every member checked him in doing directly. They made changes in the charter, by way of supplement, which, but a few days before, they had declared, under oath, would vitiate the whole instrument. This procedure was in violation of all parliamentary rule, known in this or any other enlightened country; and it can be considered in no other light than a legislative fraud, because it violated not only the constitution, according to their own showing, but also one of their express rules of order, which prohibited the repeal of any law the same session at which it was passed. On the 15th of February, 1838, this act took the form and shape of law. The very first section changed altogether the attitude of the State to the bank. In the original act, the State, being amply iddemnified, agrees to stand as the security of the stockholders; in this supplemental act she becomes primarily liable for $5,000,000. In the original act, no individual but a citizen of the State can subscribe and take stock; in this act, the State becomes a subscriber for stock, and, by express repeal, gives up her ten per cent. of the profits, her five directors, and her accommodation loan of $200,000, and becomes a partner in the banking adventure. All this is done under the talismanic word "supplement," without submitting it in any way to the people! Now, it must be apparent to the commonest understanding, that it was not in the power of the Legislature to make the State a subscriber for stock in that bank—to render her liable for the sum of $5,000,000, or any other amount—to change her attitude in any respect towards the stockholders in the bank—to enlarge or diminish her interest in the bank, as it stood at the passage of the original charter, without submitting it to the action of the people. This right had been expressly reserved to the people in their fundamental law; and, until they had been consulted in the manner prescribed, all action by their supposed agents was null and void; and the whole world were bound to take notice of it. These propositions are so self-evident, no man of candor and discrimination will dispute them. The only question remaining is, Does the present supposed liability arise under and by virtue of the supplement?

It is apparent that it does so arise—1st, from the very terms of the mortgages for stock which were drawn up by the officers of the bank, and which have been recorded in almost every county of the State; in which it is set forth that the intent of the mortgage is to secure the payment of only $10,500,000; leaving $5,000,000 (the sum already sold) to be paid by the State, by virtue of the supplemental act. 2d. It is apparent from these facts, that, at the time of the issuance of the five millions of bonds now held abroad, there were no subscribers for stock; that the books of subscription had not been kept open six months, as required by the original charter; that no bonds for stock, and no mortgages to secure them, had been taken; that no directors had been appointed by the Executive to examine and pass upon the validity of the mortgages; and that not a dollar had been paid in on a single share of stock: therefore, they must have been issued in pursuance of the supplemental act; or else there is more baseness in this whole transaction than ever characterized any other act of public functionaries. 3d. It is apparent, from the very terms of the power of attorney from the managers of the bank to the commissioners who went abroad to sell these bonds. This power of attorney, after reciting that the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Mississippi Union Bank had been passed by one Legislature, and, in conformity to the constitution, had been published, and referred to the next succeeding Legislature, which had passed and confirmed the said original act; and that the same was approved by the Governor, on the 5th day of February, 1838,—continues: "And whereas the said Legislature last above mentioned passed an act entitled An act supplemental to an act to incorporate the subscribers of the Mississippi Union Bank, which was approved by the Governor, February 5th, 1838; and whereas the Governor of the State of Mississippi has, pursuant to the provisions of the said supplemental act, subscribed, in behalf of the said State, fifty thousand shares of the capital stock of said bank, and has executed twenty-five hundred bonds of the said State of Mississippi, for the sum of two thousand dollars each," &c. If truth can produce conviction, surely this question is now placed beyond cavil. 4th. It is self-evident, that the purchaser of the bonds had not only constructive, but actual notice, that the faith of the State could not be pledged under the constitution by an act of the Legislature, without a confirmation by the people; that the supplemental act had not been confirmed by the people; and that the bonds he purchased were issued "pursuant to the provisions of the said supplementary act!"—because this power of attorney to the commissioners is made part and parcel of his contract with them, and it contains a full statement of these facts.

Mr. GWIN contended that the extract read by the Clerk from his colleague's letter was the basis upon which the canvass in Mississippi, in the election of 1841, was founded. The question was not, "Shall the bonds be paid?" but, "Shall we assume them as the bonds of the State, and not provide for their payment by taxes? or shall we assert the unconstitutionality under which they were issued, and refuse to lay the tax, because it was not the debt of the State?" He stated the fact, that not a dollar of the money for which the bonds were sold had been received by the State; that the bonds were sold by agents of the bank, appointed by authority of the unconstitutional supplement—the money received by the bank, and used by it. Not a dollar ever went into the State treasury, or was under the control of a State officer; and the archives of the State show no evidence of the existence of any such obligation as due from the State. He further observed, that the State authorities had offered no obstruction to the bondholders, if they wished to seize the assets of the bank. In fact, they had publicly expressed a desire that this course should be adopted.

Mr. G. said he differed with the statement of Governor McNutt as it regarded the worthlessness of these assets. He thought, if they were properly managed (as he had no doubt they would be, by the present board of assignees) that there would be a large surplus, after paying the circulation, to be applied to the liquidation of those bonds. In addition to these assets, there were also the mortgages of the stockholders for ten millions and a half of real estate—some of it the best in the State, and equal in productiveness to any on the face of the globe—which the first legal men in the State believed would be held liable at law for the payment of these bonds. He was no lawyer himself, and would not trust his own opinion; but the one he now stated, had the sanction of some of the ablest members of the bar in this country. No obstruction had been thrown in the way of the bondholders, who wished to proceed to foreclose these mortgages, and seize the assets proper of the bank, which, in the aggregate, exceeded fifteen millions of dollars; and which, if the property mortgaged was held liable, would more than pay the whole of the bonds, principal and interest. Thus those bonds, so much talked of, were really more likely to be paid than the bonds of those States which had paraded their resolutions against repudiation before the country.

Mr. G. said that he had alluded yesterday to the course the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] was reported to have pursued, during the negotiations at Ghent, on the subject of the navigation of the Mississippi river by British vessels. He did not believe that gehtleman was now sincere in the apprehensions he had expressed. Blue lights had been held out to our enemies during the last war, to designate the most exposed points of our territory.

The gentleman from Massachusetts may be pointed out as the finger-board, directing Great Britain to what he deems our weakest point of defence. He has declared that, in the event of war, or insurrection in the slave States, our slaves would all become free. The great object of his life seems now to be, to bring about this result; for the accomplishment of which, the whole South will be drenched in blood. What more effectual assistance can he obtain in accomplishing his object than the power of Great Britain concentrated, on his suggestion, at the South, and sending her war steamers into the midst of the slave States of the Union? In this emergency, if the States call on the General Government for assistance—if the enemy shall excite insurrection among our slaves, according to the doctrines of the gentleman—they are all to become free; and his great object will thus be accomplished. Whether or not it was the intention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to bring about this result, his course on this subject is more likely to produce that effect than any other that could be suggested. The alternative of war, if the State debts are not assumed, comes from a Representative on this floor, who once held the exalted station of President of the United States; and will, at once, be taken up and acted on by Great Britain. It has been contended that the citizens of other countries cannot understand the "metaphysical distinctions," as the gentleman calls them, between the Federal and State Constitutions. They will no longer need authority on this side of the water on this subject, after the remarks delivered by that gentleman yesterday.

The gentleman entertains much horror at the doctrine of State repudiation of debts which they had never contracted; yet he was the advocate of, and voted for, the bankrupt law, which established the most wholesale system of repudiation of honest and undisputed debts ever known in this or any other country. According to the gentleman's theory, it is disgraceful for a State, in defence of her constitution, to refuse to assume a debt contracted in her name; yet it is proper and highly meritorious for citizens of that State—many or all—to repudiate their honest debts, contracted in accordance with the constitution and laws; in contracting which, they acknowledge they have received full value. He (Mr. G.) would give an instance in point, to show the practical operation of the gentleman's theory of honorable repudiation of acknowledged private debts, and dishonorable repudiation of unacknowledged State debts.

A number of commercial houses in Liverpool, and other parts of Europe, during the glorious era of paper money from 1835 to 1840, created agencies in Mississippi and Louisiana, for the purpose of advancing upon the crops of the planters, to insure shipments to their houses. The competition in this line of business, as in most others, was carried to such an extent, that the agents of the houses, to secure the custom of the planters, advanced much more than the real value of the cotton. The result was, that these planters became indebted to the merchants in Europe—in many instances, to large amounts. Baring and Brothers, for instance, became the holders of the unpaid balances received in money by the planters, over and above the price for which their cotton sold. Baring and Brothers send over these claims for collection; the planters, having become insolvent, go into bankruptcy, surrendering assets to the amount of one cent, and thus pay their debts to their creditors. This is all honorable and praiseworthy, according to the theory of the gentleman from Massachusetts. But these same Barings hold some of the bonds issued for the Union Bank of Mississippi, which the people of the State, or a large majority of them, say were issued in violation of the constitution and laws, for which they have never received a red cent; and, yet, because they do not step forward and assume this unauthorized debt, for which they have got nothing, the gentleman says the country is disgraced and dishonored.

Mr. G. said he could adduce even a stronger case than the foregoing, which was one of actual occurrence. This celebrated Union Bank itself became a great cotton-broker. It advanced millions of dollars for cotton, at the rate of $60 per bale of 400 pounds, (equal to 15 cents a pound,) and shipped this cotton to the Barings, who advanced the bank upon it in money about $30 or $35 per bale. The cotton was sold for less than this advance, by considerably upwards of one hundred thousand dollars, as he (Mr. G.) had been informed, and believed. The bank broke, and has gone into bankruptcy, and assigned its assets; yet there is no complaint against all this, and, according to the gentleman's notion of bankruptcy, it is all honest and honorable. But the same house of the Barings receives in hypothecation, from the Bank of the United States, upon which they loan said bank money, certain bonds, purporting to be bonds of the State of Mississippi, unacknowledged by the State, and for which she received nothing, no more than she did of the cotton-advances to the Union Bank; yet, because a majority of her citizens declare these facts, and refuse to impoverish themselves by taxation to pay those bonds, they are pronounced by the gentleman from Massachusetts as dishonest, and that they have disgraced their country.

A large amount of exchequer bonds was forged not long since in Great Britain, and passed into the hands of innocent holders before the forgery was detected. That Government has repudiated them,—yet we hear no cry of disgrace or dishonor against that nation for thus acting. The State of Mississippi contends that, as these bonds were issued in violation of her constitution and laws, they are no more operative than if they had been forged; yet she is branded with dishonor and disgrace for not assuming the payment of them, because they are in the hands of innocent holders. Great Britain has repudiated a part of her national debt, (which she does not contend was not paid to her,) by taxing the income of those who hold her stocks. One individual, whose annual income from interest on Government stock was $100,000, now, since the passage of that law, gets but $80,000 clear from the same debt; yet no censure is cast by our moralists here upon that nation, for thus repudiating an acknowledged debt; while Mississippi is to be branded with infamy because she refuses to tax her people to pay an unacknowledged debt, and for which she has received nothing. Wagon-loads of continental money issued during the revolutionary war, and by the issuance of which the States were enabled to achieve their independence—countless obligations of the several States, issued in various shapes at the same time, and for value received, have been repudiated; yet no brand of national dishonor seems to have attached to us from this cause,—yet Mississippi, in refusing to acknowledge an unauthorized debt, for which she received nothing, has disgraced the nation!

Mr. G. said he could cite cases throughout the whole civilized world, of national debts for which value had been received, being repudiated, without such nations being branded with dishonor; yet this nation is pronounced dishonored, because the State of Mississippi refuses to acknowledge a debt never legally or constitutionally contracted by her, and from which her people received no benefit. Sir, said Mr. G., this pretended horror of Mississippi repudiation is as hypocritical as it is insulting. The whole band of stockbrokers, fundmongers, and paper-money robbers, in this country and Europe, and their agents here, are bellowing about Mississippi repudiation, to draw public attention from their own infamous systems of swindling. Sir, said Mr. G., we have been taunted by these men, who live upon the labor of others, through the machinery of the banking, credit, and paper-money systems, until even the Robespierre of the Harrison Administration—who was as fond of cutting off heads officially, as that monster was in reality—has attempted to cast ridicule upon his (Mr. G.'s) colleague for wishing to cut down the public expenditures to the receipts into the treasury.

The gentleman from New York reminded his (Mr. G.'s) colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] that it was not at all necessary to retrench; for, if we got in debt, the new doctrine of repudiation would very soon relieve us. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] intended to be severe upon his (Mr. G.'s) colleague; but, like the blind rattlesnake in August, he sank his fangs into his own politically corrupt body. The only practical repudiation known in this country during this century, of acknowledged, honest, and bona fide debts, had no more zealous advocate than that gentleman. None of us have forgotten the theatrical valedictory pronounced by him when this House was about passing an act to repeal the great repudiating bankrupt law, yet he has the audacity to get up, in the face of this House, and sneer at repudiation! It would be as apropos to hear a prostitute lecture about virtue and morality. He said that this course of attack upon his State would not be submitted to; and, if gentlemen travelled out of the usual course of debate to make such attacks, they must expect to be answered in a spirit becoming the Representatives of a people who feared not the scoffs of the corrupt, or the frowns of power, in asserting what they believed to be their great constitutional rights.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had taken the ground that the State debts must be assumed, or there would be war with Great Britain; and he pointed us to the fate of China, as a warning to us to beware of a contest with that powerful nation. He (Mr. G.) did not court war with Great Britain, or any other nation; but the fear of such war should never operate upon him so far as to induce him to violate the Constitution of his country, in assuming debts which that instrument gave no authority to assume or pay. When the question of war or assumption was presented to him, he was for war, as were his constituents. The mean, truckling spirit to the power of Great Britain, that is manifesting itself in this country, would meet with no response from the section of the Union from which he came. Interested more deeply than any State in the Union, as Mississippi is, in the export trade of the country, yet her citizens would be the first to resist encroachment upon the fundamental law of the land, whether that resistance led to war or not. The spirit of crouching servility was not the proper one to exhibit to that nation. He, (Mr. G.,) in the language of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] would prefer slapping John Bull in the face, than to quail before his power, if he wished to have permanent peace with him.

It was a somewhat singular coincidence, that the gentleman from Massachusetts justified the attack of Great Britain upon China, put her in the right, and and China in the wrong; and intimates that if we do not assume the State debts, and a war should be the consequence, we would be in the wrong, and England right—the cause of war in the two cases being similar. The gentleman appears to be always on the side of the British in his arguments, if he is not so in feeling. The gentleman made a great many suppositions of what would happen on account of the refusal of Mississippi to assume the payment of these bonds. I will meet that portion of his argument, by supposing that subjects of Great Britain should complain to their Government that they had been defrauded out of large sums due them by citizens of the United States, in consequence of the passage of an ex post facto law by this Government, which authorized their debtors in this country to repudiate the debts contracted in good faith, and for value received, before the passage of this law. The Government of Great Britain, through its minister here, applies to our Government for indemnity to its citizens for losses thus sustained. Our President and Secretary of State pay no attention to the application. Great Britain then resorts to that potent argument—the Paixhan gun—and sends a fleet of war steamers to Boston, to demand the payment of the English debts repudiated in that city under the bankrupt law. What is then to be done? Why, according to the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts—avoid war by all means; apply to the General Government to assume these debts, and get clear of the danger of the Paixhan guns. He (Mr. G.) had less dread of these Paixhan guns than appeared to operate on the gentleman from Massachusetts, and could by no such argument give up his opposition to the assumption of State debts. He would not now go into that question, but was prepared, at the proper time, if necessary, to lay his views before the country. He had addressed the House at this time solely to defend the State he had the honor in part to represent, against the charges made against her for the ground she had taken in relation to these bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland obtained the floor, and yielded it for an explanation to—

Mr. GRANGER, who observed that he had not sought the floor for the purpose of replying to the very refined and polished remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. GWIN,] so far as related to himself personally; but he had listened to the remarks of the gentleman, and to the paper just read at the table, and he had a word to say about Mississippi morality as that gentleman taught it. Why, what was the case, as the gentleman made it? It was, that the State of Mississippi incorporated a bank with fifteen millions of dollars capital; and then went on to enact, by a Legislature composed of a majority of the political friends of that gentleman, and who now held the same moral doctrines declared by this same Governor McNutt, that the Governor should subscribe, in the name of the State, for one-third of the stock. The stock was subscribed for, and the bonds to pay for it were signed, and put in the market, and sold at par value. The money was received for them, and constituted part of the capital of the bank. He would call on the gentleman to say whether there was another stockholder to this bank.

Mr. GWIN said that there was; and that bonds to the amount of ten millions were given for the balance of the stock, and recorded in every county in the State.

Mr. GRANGER said that these bonds had been repudiated.

Mr. GWIN denied that they had been, and said that they were well secured, and could be collected.

Mr. GRANGER contended that every dollar of the capital of this bank consisted of the money derived from the sale of these State bonds, which was all paid into the bank; and when it became inconvenient to pay them, the gentleman found out that it was unconstitutional. He came not here to speak with disrespect of any man who had been elevated to the chief magistracy of a State; but he must say that, after these bonds were signed—after the funds were received for them—it was only necessary to turn to that letter of Governor McNutt to come to the conclusion that it was only when pay-day came, that he started back in holy horror from the debt. He would go further. If he mistook not, there was a large amount of bonds out, constituting the capital of the Planters' Bank of Mississippi. These bonds, the nature of which must be known to the gentleman from Mississippi and his colleague, had not yet been repudiated. He asked the gentleman to state, in his place, his opinion whether these bonds should or should not be paid.

Mr. GWIN, in reply to the question of the gentleman, would say that all of the candidates of the Democratic party in Mississippi, during the contest in 1841, had declared themselves against repudiating these bonds. After the exhaustion of the assets of the Planters' and Railroad Banks, that were properly applicable to the payment of these bonds, they declared their willingness to meet their opponents in providing means to pay any balance of these bonds that should remain unpaid; but the party opposed to the Democrats in the State had, in the last election, refused to pledge themselves to lay a tax to pay these bonds. The Legislature of the State, at several sessions, had attempted to put the Planters' and Railroad Banks in liquidation, to apply the assets to the payment of these bonds; but had been met with obstacles, on account of the supposed chartered rights of the banks; which had caused the failure of the application of these assets to this purpose. The Senate of Mississippi, at the time, composed of a majority of Democrats, had declared, unanimously, that these bonds were the bonds of the State—the present Governor of the State being a member of the Senate at the time.

Mr. GRANGER inquired if he was to understand the gentleman from Mississippi to be in favor of repudiating the bonds of the Planters' Bank of Mississippi?

Mr. GWIN denied that he was, or ever had been, in favor of repudiating those bonds.

Mr. GRANGER said he did not mistake the signs of the times; it might not be unimportant to know and remember what the opinions of the gentleman were on that subject.

Mr. WISE, (in a firm tone, to the friends around him.) What does he mean, by its being important to know that?

Mr. GRANGER hoped the House and the country would remember that declaration of opinion. The gentleman had said that he was in favor of paying the bonds of the Planters' Bank of Mississippi; and he (Mr. G.) hoped they should see no repudiation of those bonds. He hoped, too, that gentleman's honorable colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] would be of the same way of thinking.

Now about the Union Bank bonds. He there declared, in his place, what the gentleman from Mississippi himself would not, and could not, contradict. The law granting the power, and directing the subscription for the stock of the Union Bank of Mississippi, was passed by a Legislature, a majority of whom were all your hard-money and hard-currency men—your men who read to the rest of the nation such elegant lessons on bank profligacy and bank corruption. Now, was there a prettier specimen of it than in the Union Bank, which went into operation on the money raised by the sale of those bonds? He had no sympathy with the speculators, who stood in the markets to run down the credit of the States, that they might buy their bonds below par; but, in this case, every dollar of the $5,000,000 raised by the sale of these bonds went into that bank, and it was the only money raised for the operations of the Union Bank—a bank whose stock was subscribed for by a hard-money Governor, under a law passed by a hard-money Legislature.

Mr. GWIN said, as the gentleman appeared to understand the political complexion of that Legislature very well, he would ask him if the Whig Senator at the other end of the Capitol, from that State, was not elected by that Legislature?

Mr. GRANGER said he knew it was so; for, after the passage of that law by a Legislature which had a hard-money majority, there was such a storm raised that many of the members resigned, and a Whig majority was left.

He then went on to allude to some epithets which he said had been used towards him by the gentleman from Mississippi, and said he should notice arguments, and not epithets. He then asked the gentleman from Mississippi if he was prepared to rise in this hall, and say that the Union Bank of that State ever issued a dollar upon any funds but those she raised by the sale of these five millions of bonds? And whether he was in favor of laying a tax to raise a single dollar for the repayment of them? He (Mr. G.) had nothing more to say on this subject, than to declare that he stood there ready to verify every assertion he had made.

But one word on the subject of State debts, and the remarks which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] made yesterday. He [Mr. GRANGER] did not agree with that gentleman in many of the positions which he assumed; and on one he agreed most fully with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. GWIN.] And when foreign stockholders came here, and said they knew not abroad that there was any difference between the stock of the different States of this Union, and that they had been deceived in advancing their money, believing that the faith of the General Government was pledged for its repayment, he would, with the gentleman from Mississippi, turn to them and say, Why was it, then, that you bought Illinois bonds at 40 cents, and other State bonds for 30 cents—some even for 15 cents—New York 6's for 80 and 90 cents, and Massachusetts at par? For he did not come there to glorify his own State, but to state the facts as they stood. Yes, when a foreign bondholder came to buy State bonds, and said he considered that they were all guarantied by the faith of the United States Government, he [Mr. GRANGER] would tell him that his own actions proved that he knew to the contrary.

Another word on this subject. It was a pity—a grievous pity—whatever some gentlemen might think of it, as connected with this whole subject, that the land bill of 1832, or 1833, or whatever the year was, did not become a law.

If that land bill had become a law of the land, and the distribution had taken place amongst the States, they might not have been driven to repudiation. And if the surplus funds of 1835 and 1836 had been divided out among the States in the proportion in which they were entitled to it, they would never have seen what they had seen. And he there told the gentlemen who heard him, that there was not a State of the Union—unless it was not already determined to repudiate—that would not call upon them in some form or other—either that of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON,] or some other—to make the common property of the nation be for the common benefit of the States.

He regretted to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] say that British steamers could go to Mississippi and conquer that State. He differed from him entirely on that subject, although he had never seen in that gentleman anything that looked like favoring the British. He had watched that gentleman's course towards Great Britain closely, through his whole life; and though he thought the gentleman from Massachusetts would do justice to all nations, he had often seen that the revolutionary blood which was in his veins, and the veins of his sire, rose up; and on any question of doubt between us and Great Britain, that gentleman was made what had been called a pretty "good hater." The gentleman from Massachusetts was the last man against whom a charge should be brought of favoring the British, though he (Mr. GRANGER) did not agree with him that the steamers of Great Britain could go up the Mississippi. The valley of the Mississippi alone was competent to protect her. He was, however, a little surprised the other day, and more surprised now, that some indignation had not been expressed in relation to some remarks of another gentleman on this floor. The gentleman from Mississippi charged almost treason to his country on the gentleman from Massachusetts, for intimating that British steamers could conquer the single State of Mississippi; and yet an eloquent gentleman from South Carolina, on the navy appropriation bill the other day, told them that British steamers could go up the Mississippi, and lay waste, not only one, but every State bordering on that river; and they then heard no charge from the gentleman from Mississippi, nor had they now heard any charge against the gentleman from South Carolina—no, not a word. After a few other observations, he resumed his seat.

The SPEAKER then announced that the morning hour had expired.

Mr. ADAMS obtained permission to correct an error into which the gentleman from New York had fallen. He denied that he had said British steamers could go up the Mississippi, and conquer that State; but he had supposed a case, and inquired what this Government would do under such circumstances.

Mr. GWIN said the gentleman from New York had accused him (Mr. G.) with applying epithets to him. He (Mr. G.) had applied but one epithet to the gentleman. It was, that he was the Robespierre of the Harrison administration, and was as fond of cutting off heads officially, as that monster had been in reality. He wished to call the attention of the House to the fact, that the gentleman from New York had, at the last session of Congress, declared in his place—and with a self-satisfied air that cannot be forgotten—that he had decapitated 1,700 postmasters.

Mr. GRANGER said he did not object to that at all. It was fair and legitimate.

Mr. GWIN asked to what, then, did the gentleman allude? It was the only epithet he had used in connexion with the gentleman's name; and, as the gentleman had remarked, he thought it perfectly legitimate. The observations addressed to the House a few days ago, by that gentleman, in reply to his (Mr. G.'s) colleague, who had contended for bringing down the expenditures of the Government to the national receipts, were intended to reflect upon the State of Mississippi for the position she had taken in relation to the Union Bank bonds. He (Mr. G.) thought that the gentleman's doctrine of private repudiation, by ex post facto laws, was more odious than what was charged upon Mississippi, if the charge were true; and he used the expression that, like the rattlesnake, he had sunk his fangs into his own politically-corrupt body, instead of wounding his colleague. Did the gentleman from New York object to this expression, in this connexion?

Mr. G. said that he would not trespass on the courtesy of the gentleman from Maryland, who had yielded him the floor, so long as to go into an argument to disprove all the positions taken by the gentleman from New York in regard to the Union Bank bonds—not one of which was tenable—which held the State liable for these bonds. He was prepared to show to the satisfaction of every impartial man, here or elsewhere, that there was neither legal nor constitutional liability on the State to pay these bonds; and he was willing to abide the decision of the country as to whether a moral obligation rested, where there was none constitutionally or legally. He would remark, that the Legislature that chartered this bank had been characterized as a hard-money Legislature by the gentleman from New York; but he omitted to state that nearly every Whig in it voted for the bank and supplement—that the Whig party in the Legislature of that State went almost en masse for all the bank charters that had been passed; and that party had the management of all the banks after they went into operation, and had led them to bankruptcy; as the same party had the United States, in its short rule since the 4th of March, 1841.

The subject then went over, Mr. W. C. JOHNSON having the floor for the morning hour on Monday.

WEST FLORIDA.

Mr. LEVY called for the special order of the day, being a bill for the relief of inhabitants of West Florida; which was taken up, and Mr. LEVY entered into some explanatory statements respecting the position which the question had assumed.

Mr. ADAMS also explained.

Mr. LEVY then addressed the House at length in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and in favor of the justice of the claim.

Mr. ADAMS addressed the House in reply to Mr. LEVY, and concluded with moving to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. LEVY said he was very desirous to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and for that purpose entreated him to withdraw his motion.

Mr. ADAMS did not do so, but called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the motion to lay on the table was negatived—yeas 72, nays 77.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The question recurring upon the motion to recommit the bill,

Mr. S. J. ANDREWS moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put. The effect of this motion was to bring the House to a direct vote upon the passage of the bill.

On taking the question, the result was the rejection of the bill by a vote of ayes 36, to noes 113.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland obtained the floor; but,

Mr. LEVY said he rose to a privileged question. He moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill had been rejected.

The SPEAKER ruled the motion out of order, as coming from a Delegate, who had no vote, and therefore could not have voted with the majority, which circumstance alone entitled a gentleman to move a reconsideration.

Mr. WELLER said that, in order to enable the Delegate to get in his remarks, he would himself move a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Mr. LEVY then took the floor, and, after some interruption, caused by questions of order and motions to adjourn, addressed the House in continuation of the remarks made by him to-day, and the conclusion of which was prevented by the expiration of his hour.

Mr. LEVY concluded by moving the previous question.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to lay the motion on the table, and it was carried.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS offered the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs inquire and report to this House what amount of expenditure has been improperly charged to the appropriation of July, 1836, and what amount of expenditure has been improperly charged to the appropriation of 1838—which appropriations were for carrying into effect the Cherokee treaty of 1835-'6; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Several resolutions of inquiry were then presented and adopted, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 13, 1843.

Mr. BARROW presented a memorial numerously signed by practical engineers, and 2,000 citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, complaining of the operations of the steamboat law of 1838, and pointing out its defects as regards the mode of inspecting and testing steamboat boilers. Mr. B. said the memorial was drawn up with great ability, and pointed out the defects of that law in a clear and satisfactory manner. He said the subject was then before the other House; and the motion he would submit in relation to the memorial there would have been different if he did not know that the subject was before the other branch of Congress. He then moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and be printed. Agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM presented joint resolutions adopted by the Legislature of North Carolina, declaratory of the right of that body to instruct the Senators from that State in the Congress of the United States; denying the right of Congress to tax or to give protection to any particular interest; declaring that the tariff law passed at the last session of Congress was unjust, unequal, oppressively burdensome on all other branches of industry, for the purpose of giving protection to the manufacturing interest, and, as such, was unconstitutional, and dangerous to public liberty; and recommending that it be modified and brought down to a revenue standard; and resolutions disapproving of the bankrupt law; in favor of refunding to General Jackson the fine imposed on him at New Orleans in 1815; and affirming that the veto power, in the hands of the Executive, was a conservative and necessary power, and should not be destroyed; and instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives from that State, to urge the adoption of the principles of those resolutions. The resolutions were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. G. also presented a petition from Samuel Mabron, late a captain in the United States army, praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EVANS presented a memorial from certain citizens of Maine, asking that the fishing and lumber interests may be protected by the laying of a higher rate of duties than was imposed by the existing tariff: referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. STURGEON presented joint resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives from that State, to use their influence to procure the passage of a law to refund to General Jackson the fine imposed on him by Judge Hall of New Orleans, in 1815. Mr. S. expressed much gratification at the action of the Legislature of his State upon this subject. The resolutions were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHOATE presented a memorial from the Boston Marine Society, praying the adoption of measures for preventing further injury to the harbor of Boston from the washings of the islands in the mouth of that harbor: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. C. also presented a memorial from A. B. Quimby, on the subject of his invention for the prevention of explosion of steam-boilers, and praying that the experiments authorized to test the inventions for that object may be made at Washington, instead of New York: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a number of merchants of Philadelphia engaged in the importation of goods from Germany, praying that, whilst Congress is fixing the currency value of the British pound sterling, they will at the same time establish by law the current value of German coin on the same principles: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial from Western Pennsylvania, representing (and there was no doubt of the fact) that Pennsylvania was much embarrassed by her exertions in the cause of internal improvements; and, for the purpose of relieving her, recommending an issue of stock by the United States, based on the credit of the public lands, and secured by the faith of the United States.

Also, a memorial from Pennsylvania generally, and one from citizens residing in Chester county in that State, recommending the issue of $200,000,000 of stock by the United States, for the relief of the States; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, presented a memorial from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, asking that Mr. Kendall may be restored to his personal liberty, and that he may be also remunerated for the loss of time and expenses incurred in defending himself against the suit which terminated in a verdict for damages, in his individual capacity, for a faithful discharge of his official duties as Postmaster General: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial from a number of citizens residing on the line of the Cumberland road, in Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed change in the route of that road: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, presented a petition from Eliza Rose, widow of Jacob Rose, a soldier of the Revolution, for a pension: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a petition from William Williams, captain in the revolutionary army of the United States, for commutation: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a memorial from Montpelier, Jefferson county, Ohio, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was laid on the table.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition from 283 citizens of Lake county, Illinois, and Racine county, Wisconsin Territory, praying the establishment of a mail route from Libertyville, in Lake county, Illinois, by way of F. F. Munson's and D. C. Burgess's, to Burlington, in Racine county, Wisconsin Territory; which, together with the accompanying diagram, and the letter of W. F. Shepard, E. J. Simmons, and F. F. Munson, was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a petition numerously signed by inhabitants of the town of Salem, in Wayne county, New York, asking Congress to interfere in the case of Mr. Kendall, and to restore him to personal liberty: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KERR presented a memorial from citizens of Prince George's county, Maryland, praying Congress to purchase and make free one of the bridges across the eastern branch of the Potomac: referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KERR presented some additional evidence in support of the claim of Charles Dawkins.

Mr. MOREHEAD presented a memorial from sachems and counsellors of the Stockbridge tribe of Indians, residing in Wisconsin, praying for indemnity for a large sum of money which was expended in endeavoring to protect their rights before the Government of the United States: referred to the Judiciary Committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a petition from William Maxwell of Illinois, asking Congress to pass a law directing a tract of land adjoining his farm, belonging to the United States, to be sold—no survey of it having been yet made: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of Charles Larabee for a pension.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, copies of General Jackson's letter to that department, dated Nashville in 1815, and copies of papers transmitted by General Jackson, signed by certain general officers, justifying the declaration of martial law at New Orleans: laid on the table.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which lies one day on the table, under the rule:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the commission, or letter of instruction, which may have been given to Daniel Webster, esq., Secretary of State, to treat with Lord Ashburton, late special minister from Great Britain to the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, House bills of the following titles:

An act for the relief of George A. Winslow;

An act for the relief of Charles Waldron; and

An act for the relief of John R. Chandler.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of John Skirving.

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported, without amendment, the bill from the House entitled "An act to provide, in certain cases, for the sale of the real estate of infants within the District of Columbia."

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported adversely to the passage of House bill 672.

Mr. WOODBURY, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, without amendment, and adversely to its passage, House bill entitled "An act for the relief of W. Barry, widow and administratrix of Thomas Barry." The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported back, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of John Randolph Clay, late secretary of legation of the United States to the court of Vienna.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the joint resolution directing the transfer of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, to the cities of Alexandria, Georgetown, and Washington, on certain conditions.

Mr. MERRICK moved several verbal amendments, which were agreed to.

The resolution was then reported to the Senate; and, the amendments having been concurred in,

Mr. KING remarked that he had not had time to examine the amendments which had been made to the resolution. He desired, therefore, an opportunity to do so.

Mr. MERRICK said that opportunity would be afforded after the resolution was ordered to be engrossed, if the Senator should find anything objectionable in it.

The resolution was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DAYTON introduced a bill authorizing the settlement of the accounts of William N. ———, (name not heard;) which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. YOUNG rose and gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask the Senate to postpone all the previous orders of the day, for the purpose of taking up the bankrupt law. He did this, agreeably to the resolutions of the Legislature of his State in favor of the repeal of that law. Senators would all agree that the session was rapidly passing away; and if action was not had speedily on the subject, the law could not be repealed at all.

Mr. BERRIEN thought the Senate could hardly proceed to the consideration of a bill of such magnitude upon so short a notice. It was his purpose to ask the Senate to fix upon some day sufficiently distant to enable gentlemen to come prepared to entertain the subject calmly, considerately, and understandingly.

Mr. YOUNG observed that great solicitude was felt by many of the States, and by the community at large, that the subject should be acted upon this session. He hoped the Senator from Georgia would now call upon the Senate to fix a day, or name it himself.

Mr. BERRIEN said that, in the course of the present day, or to-morrow, he would call upon the Senate to fix a day.

Mr. YOUNG said he was content with the Senator's declaration to that effect.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked that he had intended this morning to speak privately to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. BERRIEN,] with a view of pointing out to him the impatience felt throughout the country on the subject. There was not a day that he did not receive letters of pressing inquiry—all anxious to have the matter settled before it is too late to expect the action of Congress this session. Could not the Senator now name the day—Thursday, Friday, or Saturday—or even Monday? Let a day be fixed, and let the bill be disposed of. For his part, he did not see why it might not be to-morrow, for he was certain every one had made up his mind already.

Mr. BERRIEN would prefer the matter to be left as agreed upon between himself and the Senator from Illinois.

RETRENCHMENT, ECONOMY, AND GOVERNMENT RESOURCES.

The resolutions introduced on Tuesday last by Mr. McDuffie, on the propriety of adopting measures to revive commerce, replenish the impoverished exchequer, and to arrest the accumulation of public debt, by reducing the tariff of the last session to a revenue standard, and by practising a rigid system of retrenchment, economy, and accountability, came up for consideration.

Mr. McDUFFIE addressed the Senate for about two hours, tracing the condition of the country to its true foundation, and pointing out the necessity of retracing those steps by which the Government had been led astray, through unwise and improvident legislation. Mr. McD.'s speech (of which a full report is in preparation) was distinguished for its eloquence and comprehensive range of policy. He took a bold and uncompromising stand upon the three main propositions of his resolutions: that the present distress of the country was due to the system which had overflowed the treasury at the expense of commerce, and had superinduced a state of things which necessarily led to an inflated currency, enormous expansions of the currency, extended credits, wild speculations, disastrous disappointment, and, in time, consequent bank contractions, revulsions, prostration, and ruin. Either in perfect ignorance of, or wilfully blind to, the true sources of the evils which exist, a tariff bill had been passed last session, the sure effects of which have been the decaying and crippled state of commerce, which rendered it utterly incapable of longer sustaining the Government.

With an impoverished and exhausted treasury, and a national debt rapidly accumulating, the Government had adopted the suicidal policy of putting shackles on that commerce which had been its sole support for the fifty years of its existence, had carried the country triumphantly through two exhausting wars, had subsequently paid off an enormous national debt, and then been forced to swell the public coffers to repletion. It was absurd to hope for any relief for the present condition of the country from attempts to regulate the currency and exchanges. These were things which would best regulate themselves, by being left to work out their own cure. Gentlemen, to relieve the country, must retrace their steps, and remove from commerce the shackles they had so unwisely and improvidently imposed upon it; they must revise their tariff law, and bring down duties to a revenue standard; they must abandon their narrow-sighted policy of protecting special interests, at the expense of other interests of incalculably more importance; and they must economize and retrench the expenditures of the Government.

On each of these points Mr. McD. expatiated with great eloquence and ability; sustaining his views by arguments no less cogent and statesmanlike than original.

On the suggestion by Mr. EVANS, the resolutions were passed over informally till to-morrow.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to issue to the heirs of John Campbell a patent for the remainder of a private land claim at Prairie du Chien, in the Territory of Wisconsin."

There being no amendment proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. KERR, from the Judiciary Committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Gorham A. Worth, one of the sureties of Samuel Edmunds, deceased."

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the Senate took up for consideration as in committee of the whole, House bill entitled "An act to authorize the enrolment or register of the brig Nueva Granada." There being no amendment proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate, and, according to order, read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, Franklin Whitney had leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. ARCHER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of William Evans.

On motion by Mr. GRAHAM, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill from the House for the relief of W. W. Street; which was considered, reported to the Senate, read the third time, and passed.

The joint resolution for the distribution of certain copies of the Census returns, and Compendium of the Sixth Census, was taken up as in committee of the whole; and, after a few remarks by Messrs. HENDERSON and KING in opposition to its passage, and by Mr. TAPPAN in its favor, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. BARROW, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the Senate bill to grant a tract of land to Villeneuve LeBlanc, in consideration of the benefit derived to the public lands from his services to damming up the mouth of False river.

Mr. BARROW and Mr. HENDERSON defended the bill, on the ground of services rendered to the United States. They stated that the exertions of this individual had reclaimed to the United States nearly 500,000 acres of land; and that, notwithstanding his exertions were to benefit his own property, by damming this river, and that he had no legal claims against the United States, yet they thought it but just that he should be remunerated with 1,000 acres of the land reclaimed, for his trouble and great expense in making the dam which had reclaimed it.

Messrs. CALHOUN and KING opposed the passage of the bill, on the ground that there was no legal claim; that the individual had performed the work for his own private benefit, without the authority of the United States—without regard to the benefit or injury to its property; and the principle involved was a new and dangerous one.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and rejected, on yeas and nays—yeas 11, nays 19.

On motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 13, 1843.

Mr. FORNANCE presented the petition of Geo. Richards, William Vangezer, and 19 others, citizens of Pottstown, Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, asking for the distribution of $200,000,000 national stock.

Also, the petition of J. C. Slemmer, J. R. Weeks, and 35 others, citizens of Pottstown, Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to restore to Amos Kendall his personal liberty, and remunerate him for the loss sustained by several suits recently brought against him.

Mr. CHARLES A. FLOYD presented a petition that Greenport, in the county of Suffolk, New York, be made a port of entry.

Mr. DODGE of Wisconsin presented the petition of James B. Estis, of Iowa county, Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress for remuneration for property destroyed and services rendered the United States during the war with the Sac Indians, in the year 1832.

Mr. BURKE presented the petitions of Susanna Vinton, Polly Chase, Elizabeth Hall, Submit Roberts, Isabel Bugbee, Mary Wood, Marcy Bemis, and Lydia Sanders, praying to be placed on the roll of revolutionary pensioners: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. HASTINGS presented the memorial of 103 farmers of Columbiana county, Ohio, asking Congress to equalize the tariff, and in just reference to their staples of wool and hides.

Also, the memorial of 63 farmers of Carroll county, Ohio, on the same subject.

Also, the memorial of 35 farmers of Columbiana county, Ohio, on the same subject.

Mr. CHARLES J. INGERSOLL presented the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, in favor of refunding to General Jackson the fine imposed on him by Judge Hall in 1815; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MOORE rose and said he was about to move a resolution, which he hoped would meet with the concurrence of his brother Whigs of the House. It was, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of proceeding with the resolution on the subject of General Jackson's fine.

Mr. READ rose to a question of order. By the 23d rule, this was one of the days assigned for the reception of resolutions from the several States, without debate; and he called upon the Speaker to enforce that rule. He had business of importance belonging to his State, which he had for a long time been waiting in vain to present.

Mr. CUSHING asked if this was not the day assigned for the consideration of the bill on the subject of commercial treaties, introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KENNEDY.]

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he was right in the construction he had given to the rule; but the bill reported by the gentleman from Maryland had been made the special order for to-day, and could not be set aside but by general consent.

Mr. READ appealed from the decision of the Chair. He made this appeal for the purpose of being heard once in the course of the session. He had not, since he had been here, been able to get the floor for five minutes.

The SPEAKER said that the appeal was not debatable, and put the question to the House; which was decided by sustaining the decision.

Mr. HOPKINS hoped that, by general consent, the House would, before proceeding to the regular order, take up and refer the bills from the Senate; which being agreed to, the following were severally read twice, and referred to appropriate committees:

The bill for the relief of the heirs of William Fisher.

The bill to prevent the employment of private expresses on the mail routes, and for the prevention of frauds on the Post Office; and

The bill in relation to the two per cent. fund of the State of Mississippi.

DOMESTIC HEMP.

The joint resolution of the House, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, to establish agencies for the purchase of American water-rotted hemp, was taken up; the question being on the amendments of the Senate.

The amendments being read, Mr. SMITH of Virginia moved to lay the resolution and amendments on the table; which motion was decided in the negative—yeas 69, nays 136.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS moved the previous question, and it was sustained by the House; and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

COMET AND ENCOMIUM.

The House then took up the bill for the relief of William Selden, Treasurer of the United States, on the question of concurring in the amendment of the Senate. This bill was originally entitled "A bill for the relief of claimants to indemnities received from the British Government for the loss of slaves from on board the Comet and Encomium at Nassau, Bahamas."

Mr. STANLY moved the previous question, which was sustained; a motion to lay the bill on the table was negatived, and the Senate's amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was concurred in, for the purpose of offering some observations thereon. He then proceeded with some remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. GIDDINGS'S hour having expired—

Mr. CUSHING observed that the gentleman from Ohio, in the course of his remarks on this bill, had made allusion to himself, among others, when speaking of the resolution in consequence of which the vote casting censure on him was passed; and he had not only travelled out of the issue involved in it, but, throughout the whole of his remarks, had indulged in that exaggeration of language which was to be anticipated from a person whose mind was governed by this one idea, and was, therefore, incapable of entering into the elements of the question before the House. What was that question? A bill had passed this House for the purpose of paying to certain citizens of the United States a sum of money, lying in the treasury, to which they were justly entitled. That bill having been amended in the Senate, came back to the House in the ordinary course of business; and having, in like manner, been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, it was reported back, as amended, to the House. Exception was then raised to the bill by the gentleman from Ohio, who took the ground, that whoever voted for it would be guilty of a violation of the Constitution, and of servility in submitting to the dictation of the South. He denied the correctness of the ground thus assumed by the gentleman from Ohio. If they went behind the bill, what was the state of the case presented to them? Certain citizens of the United States complained that injury had been done them by a foreign Government. What happened next? The Executive, under that complaint, proceeded to do what had been done in all cases where our citizens had complained of wrongs done them by a foreign Government, and ordered the minister of the United States at the court of St. James to lay the complaint before that court, and to demand redress. Upon receiving a statement of the case from our minister, the British Government admitted that our citizens had been injured, and that they were entitled to redress; and, therefore, without the formality of a treaty, but upon the admission of the manifest wrong that was done, they paid the amount of indemnity into our treasury. These were the incontestable facts of the case. The British Government having thus paid the indemnity into the treasury of the United States, this bill proposed to divide it among the claimants. Now what did the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] propose? That we shall throw this money back to the British Government? Did the gentleman propose that this Government should be guilty of a breach of trust, and embezzle the money thus placed in its hands? He assumed that, if the United States completed the faithful execution of the trust thus reposed in them, by paying this money over to the complainants, and for which the Government is responsible in honor, that it would be a fraud. Now he, (Mr. C.,) on the contrary, contended that it would amount to a fraud or embezzlement, if the Government refused to pay it over. But the gentleman from Ohio said that the original assertion of the claim for indemnity was in violation of the Constitution; that the Executive had no right to make this claim on the British Government, and therefore the bill ought not to pass. He denied the consequence. If the British Government paid this money into the treasury of the United States, without having the power to enforce the demand, still it was its duty to pay it over to those entitled to it.

The objections of the gentleman from Ohio to this bill were two; and consisted, first, in the assertion of that gentleman that there could be no property of person in person by the laws of nature; that those persons in the liberation of whom the injury was committed, were not slaves, but freemen; and that, therefore, money should not be paid for them. Now, upon the question of property, the gentleman was arguing not what was law—not what was municipal law, or the laws of nations; but what should, in his abstract notions, be law. They had, however, nothing to do with the gentleman's abstract theories, but were dealing with fixed and established laws, and their duties under them. Here was the case of certain slaves set free by the provincial authorities of the island of New Providence; for which the Government of the United States, in behalf of its citizens, demanded indemnity. What did the British Government say to that demand? That Government was at the time an abolition Government, ruled by an abolition ministry, with an abolition Parliament, which had recently enacted a law for the abolition of slavery in the British colonies. It would, therefore, naturally have been expected that the answer would have been in accordance with the views of the gentleman from Ohio. The answer did not come from an anti-abolition Government; it did not come from one of our Southern States, where slavery is recognised as a part of their institutions; but it came from an abolition Government with an abolition ministry, and at the highest possible period of abolition excitement. What was that answer? It was, so far as the Comet and Encomium were concerned, that the authorities of Nassau had committed a violation, not only of municipal law, but of the laws of nations; and that they would treat the claimants to indemnity in the same way that they treated the owners of slaves in the island of New Providence when they abolished slavery in it, viz: if the bond between master and slave was to be abolished, the consideration was to be paid by the Government. Upon this principle, the money was paid over by the British Government to ours. There was a perfect answer to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio. While they made this answer in relation to the slaves that were liberated from the Encomium and Comet, they came to a different decision in regard to those slaves who were on board the Enterprise. In the latter case, they decided that, as the act of Parliament emancipating the slaves in the British islands was passed prior to the liberation of the slaves in the vessel last named, they would not pay for them.

He then proceeded to notice the tendency of the arguments of the gentleman from Ohio, at some length; and to protest and remonstrate against them, as incompatible with the union of these States; and concluded by stating that he should vote against he reconsideration.

Mr. ARNOLD said this was not a proper time to enter on this discussion; and he therefore moved to lay the question of reconsideration on the table.

Mr. STANLY entreated the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw it, to permit him to make a few observations; which being assented to, he entered into some explanation.

Mr. WELLER also made an explanatory statement, mainly in reply to an observation which had been made by his colleague, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] to the effect, that he was cut off from a defence of himself, when the resolutions of censure were passed at the last session, by the previous question being moved by his colleague, (himself.) Now, he (Mr. WELLER) appealed to the recollection of the House, whether he did not offer to withdraw the motion for the previous question, if his colleague would say that he wished to be heard in his defence.

After a few words from Messrs. WISE, ADAMS, GIDDINGS, ARNOLD, and BRIGGS,

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table, by a vote of yeas 140, to nays 38, as follows:

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GIDDINGS said he rose to a privileged question. He proceeded to state his grievances to the House; but the first part of his remarks were imperfectly heard, owing to the gathering of members in that part of the hall. He was understood to say, that as he was standing in the aisle this morning, Mr. DAWSON of Louisiana came by him and pushed him aside. Thereupon, he turned round to Mr. DAWSON, and asked him if he meant to insult him; to which Mr. D. replied, "Yes, sir." Now, he wished to raise the question, whether a member was free to insult another for remarks made in the House, in the exercise of his privileges as a member and a freeman. He had no fears of his person, but the House might protect its own dignity; and he laid the fact before it, for such action as it might see fit to make.

The SPEAKER observed that he had witnessed no such occurrence as that related by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] or he should have preserved the order of the House.

Mr. GIDDINGS said he did not intend to cast any reflection on the Speaker.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON rose and said he wished the House and the country to take notice that this matter was brought up here by the member from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] in the absence of Gen. DAWSON.

Several members: Let the matter drop.

Mr. CALHOUN rose and called for the reading of that part of the manual, or rules appointed for the government of the House, which related to the personal privileges of members. He wished gentlemen to understand their rights on that floor.

Mr. TURNEY rose to a question of order.

Mr. WISE said he would remark, in perfect good temper, that he had no doubt the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DAWSON] was passing up the aisle, when he found the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] in his way. The aisles, as gentlemen knew, were very narrow; and nothing was more common than for members to gently push each other aside, in order to pass along. But for the fact that the gentleman from Ohio turned round to the gentleman from Louisiana, and peremptorily asked him whether he meant to insult him, he (Mr. W.) had no doubt that nothing would have happened. He had no feeling whatever against the gentleman from Ohio, and he did not believe that there was a more gentlemanly man in the House than the gentleman from Louisiana. Nobody would have heard of the occurrence between the two gentlemen, had not the gentleman from Ohio brought it to the notice of the House. He suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CALHOUN] not to insist on his call for the reading of the manual, and that the matter be permitted to pass by in good feeling.

Mr. GIDDINGS said he had no desire to occupy the time of the House. He disclaimed any personal feeling or anxiety about the matter.

Mr. CALHOUN insisted on the reading of the manual on the subject of the privilege of members.

Mr. MOORE rose to make a statement of what had occurred, according to his observation. His colleague, when the occurrence related by the gentleman from Ohio happened, was in the best possible humor, and, he was sure, intended no insult in pushing the gentleman from Ohio aside, in order to pass along the narrow aisle.

Mr. MALLORY also stated to the House his recollection of what occurred. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DAWSON] was coming down the aisle. He (Mr. M.) saw the gentleman from Louisiana touch the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] but not so as to move him. He was satisfied that the gentleman from Louisiana was going along about his business in a good humor, and would not have made a rude reply to the gentleman from Ohio, had not that gentleman extorted it from him by his question.

Mr. WISE said the gentleman from Louisiana gave the gentleman from Ohio the gentlest push imaginable.

Mr. ADAMS. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that it was not an attempt to cut his throat from ear to ear.

Mr. GIDDINGS said he had no personal wishes in this matter. He would not have said what he did, had not the gentleman from Louisiana answered that he intended to insult him.

Mr. WISE. But the gentleman from Louisiana did not say so until the gentleman from Ohio extorted the declaration from him.

Here the matter dropped.

ment of the Surgeon General, while he was to have the Surgeon General and the army under his control. It was making a new bureau, at the head of which Mr. Espy was to be placed. And thus, by a side movement, or indirect beginning, that which could not be attempted openly, was effected. The foundation was laid for this new bureau; and now the structure was about to be raised. It was not to stop at this $2,000. After the thing is made fast, there will be a regular establishment. He would read the report of the Surgeon General.

[Here Mr. B. read the report, stating that Mr. Espy had done no service for his department, either as clerk or otherwise, since his appointment; and that there was no occasion in the department for his services.]

Mr. B. contended that the Surgeon General was fully competent to have the necessary observations made and collected, and that the service would be effectually done if this appropriation was never made. It was not necessary to create a new bureau for the purpose of holding a scientific correspondence with all the world. If already, within less than a year, it had grown up (as gentleman averred) to 1,500 correspondents, it would very shortly require several clerks to do nothing else but frank letters. There was no knowing where the expense was to end.

Mr. EVANS objected to any postponement of the bill on the supposition that the report of the Surgeon General was necessary. The Committee on Finance was aware of it; the Senator from Missouri had it before him. All that could be known from delay was already known.

Mr. BENTON contended that it was improper to make this amendment, every way it could be considered. The House of Representatives had left out the appropriation, having a full knowledge not only of the Surgeon General's report, but of the recommendation of the Secretary of War, whose letter to the Committee of Ways and Means is dated so far back as 13th January.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that, in what he had to say upon this subject, he certainly did not mean to make any insinuation against the Surgeon General. He had the pleasure of an acquaintance with that gentleman; and he believed a more worthy and respectable man did not exist. Mr. Espy, like all others who had made discoveries of any importance, had been assailed by ridicule; and probably the zeal which enabled men to make important discoveries, always carried them beyond the bounds of prudence. This had been Mr. Espy's fate in the beginning; but his mind was now matured. And he (Mr. B.) believed with the Senator from Mississippi, that in his particular branch of science, he was exceeded by no man living: such was the opinion entertained of him by the most enlightened foreigners.

The great objection seemed to be, that, by the adoption of this amendment, a new bureau would be created. But would this be the case? What facts had they before them to warrant such an inference? Directly the reverse seemed to be the case. Mr. Espy was to be attached to the office of the Surgeon General. He was to act under his authority and direction; and to receive, as compensation, $2,000 per annum. Would that be the establishment of a new bureau, any more than the appointment of an additional clerk in any department of the Government? He could not see by what possibility a new bureau was to grow out of it.

But what was the object of the proposition? He desired to bring it distinctly before the Senate. In August, 1832, an appropriation was made (of which he had no knowledge at the time) for procuring meteorological observations, under the direction of the Surgeon General, who appointed Mr. Espy to the performance of that duty; and, after he had been most advantageously engaged upon it for a great length of time, it was now proposed to cut him down by legislation. Did it not seem very invidious to aim at that gentleman, and him alone? Had he done anything to merit such treatment? If it were deemed proper to make these observations at all, at the different military posts, there ought to be some gentleman of scientific acquirements to generalize them; for the mere naked observations would be of little avail.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] had just put into his hands a book, which showed the estimation in which Mr. Espy was held by the most scientific body in the world—he meant the French Institution of Natural Science.

Mr. BUCHANAN, having read a passage from the work referred to, remarked, that the case could be summed up in few words. Congress had already, by a law, made an appropriation for the purpose of employing such an agent as Mr. Espy; and he had been employed, not as the head of a bureau, but as a subordinate in the office of the Surgeon General, where he had rendered eminent service to the cause of science; and the question was now, whether they would, by refusing to adopt this proposition, drive that gentleman from the pursuit in which he had been engaged so much to the advantage of the military and the naval service, and to the enlightenment of all mankind. For his own part, he could not conscientiously do that, by legislation, which would operate as a sort of personal attack upon this gentleman, whom he believed to be better qualified than any other man for this important service.

The debate was continued by Messrs. WALKER, CALHOUN, BENTON, TAPPAN, and EVANS; and then the question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 13.

The other amendments were also adopted.

Mr. MILLER, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, called the attention of the Senate to the proviso regulating the appointment of cadets for West Point Academy, in which it was, in future, to be by apportionment to congressional districts, giving each member of the House a right of nomination. It was limited to the number of Representatives and Delegates. He moved an amendment, allowing one nomination for the District of Columbia.

This was agreed to.

Mr. KING pointed out a difficulty that might arise from the reduction to the number of members by the new apportionment, [266] Heretofore, although the Secretary of War had the power of making the nominations, a practice had grown up of allowing each member of Congress in turn to make a recommendation from his district. But there were some appointments made by the Secretary himself, without reference to locality; which enabled him to appoint the sons of military officers—a privilege so proper and necessary, that it ought not to be withdrawn.

After some discussion on this point, it was suggested that an addition of ten cadets for that purpose might be made; and the bill was so amended, as that the number of cadets will be one for each congressional district, and ten on general appointment by the Secretary of War.

Mr. CONRAD moved an amendment to appropriate $10,000 for removing obstructions from the mouth of the Red river. He pointed out the necessity of immediate action on this subject; as, if something were not speedily done, the channel of that river would be changed into the Achafalaya, and the course of the river thrown into the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. EVANS hoped this amendment would not be allowed on this bill. There was a bill before the Senate on the subject of improving the navigation of the Mississippi river and its tributaries, to which it could more properly be attached.

The amendment was negatived.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate; and the amendments being concurred in, it was ordered to be read a third time; and subsequently it was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate then went into executive session; and after some time spent therein, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 10, 1843.

Mr. BERSON presented the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Fayette county, Pennsylvania, held at the court-house in Uniontown, on the 4th February inst.; and also, the memorial of Andrew Stewart, George Mason, Daniel Black, esq'rs, and two hundred and thirty-seven others, in which they respectfully request the Congress of the United States to authorize the issue of two millions of 3 per cent. stock to be divided among the States, for the payment of which the public lands and their proceeds to be specifically pledged: referred to the special committee on that subject.

Mr. J. C. EDWARDS presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, in reference to the Territory of Oregon: referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. READ of Pennsylvania presented a remonstrance, signed by sundry citizens of Bradford county, Pennsylvania, against the repeal of the bankrupt law: laid on the table.

Mr. MEDILL presented the petition of Wm. Wheatley, clerk of the penitentiary in the district of Columbia, praying the allowance of compensation for certain services rendered to the institution.

Mr. JOSEPH H. WILLIAMS moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the joint resolution of yesterday, in relation to the Cherokee treaty, was referred to the Committee of the Whole; and, without taking the question, the motion was entered, and passed over by general consent.

Mr. LINN moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the proposition of the Committee of Claims to employ a clerk was negatived; and desired the motion to be entered.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON insisted upon taking the question of reconsideration now.

Mr. LINN withdrew his motion.

GEN. JACKSON'S FINE.

The SPEAKER announced the next business in order to be the resolution for refunding the fine imposed on General Jackson, at New Orleans, by Judge Hall, in 1815.

Mr. DAWSON, who was entitled to the floor, commenced addressing the House on this subject; but had spoken but a few words, when

Mr. EVERETT rose and objected, that the subject on which the gentleman was addressing the House was not in order.

The SPEAKER said that reports of committees were in order; but believing that all the committees had reported, he had allowed the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DAWSON] to commence his remarks on the next business in order.

Mr. FILLMORE insisted that the strict order of business be observed.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked if it was not too late to interrupt the gentleman from Louisiana, after he had commenced his remarks, and been recognised by the Chair.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Louisiana had been permitted to proceed by courtesy, on the supposition that there were no reports of committees to make. As the regular order of business was insisted on, the Chair must observe it.

Mr. EVERETT rose to a privileged question, and moved a reconsideration of the vote referring the bill for the occupation and settlement of Oregon, reported by the Select Committee to the Committee of the Whole House. As the bill on the same subject, which came from the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, he thought this bill should be referred to the same committee. It was, therefore, that he now moved that the vote on the reference to the Committee of the Whole be reconsidered. Mr. E. concluded by moving the previous question, under the operation of which the motion for reconsideration was carried—ayes 88, noes 50.

On motion by Mr. EVERETT, and under the operation of the previous question, the bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FILLMORE then called for reports of committees.

Mr. WELLER moved to suspend the business of the morning hour, in order to allow Mr. DAWSON to proceed with his remarks on the resolution to refund General Jackson's fine; but, on putting the question, the motion was rejected.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE from the Committee of Ways and Means, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the twelve million loan, together with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the same committee, reported a bill authorizing the re-issue of treasury notes, and for other purposes; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

Mr. JOSEPH R. INGERSOLL, by direction of the Committee of Ways and Means, called up the motion to print 10,000 extra copies of the majority and minority reports of that committee, on the subject of an issue of two hundred millions of Government stocks to be given to the States.

Mr. ADAMS hoped that the printing of these reports would not be ordered. He did not think that it was properly made, for the reason that a short time before, a number of memorials, together with a resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON,] on the same subject, was referred to a Select Committee; the Committee of Ways and Means, therefore, in reporting as they did, without waiting for the action of the Select Committee, acted with unnecessary haste and precipitation, and they seemed to him to have run a race of popularity for the purpose of throwing odium on that proposition. He meant to impeach the motives of no member of the House—far less of the Committee of Ways and Means; but, in a parliamentary point of view, it was neither respectful to the House, nor to the gentleman from Maryland, for the committee to make their report with so much precipitation.

Mr. PICKENS would respectfully ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if the memorials on this subject (or, at least, a number of them) had not been presented by him, and referred on his motion to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ADAMS was unable to answer the question of the gentleman; and he would tell him, or rather tell the House, the reason why. He had, it was true, received a number of these memorials, and for that reason he had felt himself called on to take part in this discussion, which otherwise he would not have done. The gentleman from South Carolina was perfectly aware of a rule of the House, which denied him the privilege of offering petitions as he received them; that, instead of the ancient rule, by which particular days were assigned for the reception of petitions, they now had the gag-rule—the 21st rule—that odious and detestable rule by which the people of the United States were deprived of the right of having their petitions presented in open day, and compelled to have them referred secretly, and subject to a decision at the Clerk's table whether they shall be received or not. That was the reason why he did not know whether the memorials presented by him had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means or not. He was compelled here, by the rules, not to offer to the House memorials that had been sent to him, but to present them at the Clerk's table, and to leave it to the discretion of the Speaker to decide whether they shall be received or not, and to say to what committee they shall be referred. He mentioned this, to show that the gentleman from South Carolina need not make so much of the fact, that memorials presented by him on this subject had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

He believed that an unusual motive had operated with the Committee of Ways and Means in making their report in such a hurry, and that, in making these reports, the majority and minority (for there were two of them) had run a race of popularity to cry down and make odious before the people of the United States the project of the gentleman from Maryland, to which—let gentlemen of both sides, Whig or Locofoco, do what they will—they must, in time, come. Let them now say what they please, "to that complexion they must come at last." What was it but, in substance, a proposition that the General Government of this country shall come to the aid of the States of the Union, who, for laudable purposes, and for objects of general utility to the country, have involved themselves in debt from which they cannot relieve themselves, and therefore come to the Government of this nation, to assist them in discharging those duties which belonged to honor and morality, viz: to pay their debts?

It was far from him to impute any improper motives to the Committee of Ways and Means; but he said, when he heard these reports read—of the majority and minority—that they had not considered, by any means, the extent and importance of the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland. Though the Speaker had done him the honor to place him on the select committee raised on that subject, he did not mean to be understood as committing himself to support it. He did not mean to make himself responsible for it. But he did, in behalf of the honor of the nation, demand of its Representatives that the proposition shall be fully, fairly, and impartially considered; and not set aside in this way by a side blow from the Committee of Ways and Means. He had said that, however lightly either party in this House, Whig or Locofoco, Northern or Southern, might treat this proposition, they would have to come to a very serious consideration of its objects and its purposes before they could decide against it. It was a marvellous thing to him—a surprising thing—that the Whigs of that House, and the Whig party, should feel such extreme anxiety not to have the imputation fixed on them that they favored the project of the gentleman from Maryland. They might think, because the Locofocos were now in such a flow of victory, that they might be subject to the charge of treason, and to be tried under the second section, if they were suspected of favoring this project for relieving the States who were involved in debt. It seemed to him, so fearful was the committee of having such an imputation fixed on them, that they ran a race in making their report. The Whigs who made it, seemed to think that their salvation depended upon their protesting that they never, never would consent to give any aid to the States involved in the burden of debt. Some of the States, it seemed, had refused to acknowledge their debts at all; and they had had declarations from one of them—the State of Mississippi—that the people of that State would sooner endure war than pay their debts.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON wished to correct the gentleman. The State of Mississippi never had refused, and never would refuse, to pay her debts.

Mr. ADAMS said he would refer the gentleman to the letter of Governor McNutt, in which that declaration was made.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON said he wished distinctly to declare that the State of Mississippi had never refused to pay her debts; but that she had refused to acknowledge as a debt, a claim made on her by unauthorized persons.

Mr. ADAMS said, there was the letter from Gov. McNutt: the gentleman might send for it.

Mr. THOMPSON said that the gentleman might send for it himself. And he would add, that the letter of the Governor, which the gentleman spoke of, was a private, and not an official letter. The State of Mississippi only acted by her Legislature, with the approval of the Governor, and not by the Governor alone.

Mr. PICKENS rose to a question of order. This was a question of printing; and if this extensive field of debate was to be opened, there was no knowing where it would end.

The SPEAKER stated to the gentleman from South Carolina that the question of printing opened the whole merits of the case.

Mr. ADAMS continued. He would have the letter of Governor McNutt here, and he hoped the gentleman from Mississippi would read it for his own character's sake, for Governor McNutt said that the two Representatives from Mississippi concurred with him in saying that they would rather go to war than pay the debt. He wished to know if the gentleman concurred with the Governor.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON said he would inform the gentleman that he did concur with the Governor, in preferring to go to war to paying a claim that his State had never acknowledged to be a debt. Neither he nor his State had ever refused to pay a debt that was due by the State. Let the gentleman produce the letter itself.

Mr. ADAMS said, there was the letter he referred to; and in it the Governor expressly said that his State would rather go to war than pay a debt. He did not intend to enter into the question whether the State of Mississippi had been defrauded by its own agents or officers. He did not intend to enter into that question at all. He now desired the Clerk to read the letter of Governor McNutt, as the gentleman was so exceedingly anxious to have it produced.

The letter of Governor McNutt was then read. It was a private letter, written to a gentleman in Richmond, and published in one of the Richmond papers.

Mr. ADAMS resumed, and said, on that the House could determine. He did not intend to enter into the metaphysical question whether the State of Mississippi was or was not bound to pay its bonds. By his letter, Governor McNutt presupposed that war would come from abroad, in consequence of the refusal of the State of Mississippi to pay them; and he preferred to go to war, rather than pay those bonds. Now he (Mr. A.) would inquire of this House if the foresight of the Governor of Mississippi should prove true—if the Governments of those subjects, who have suffered in their property by their trust and confidence in the punctuality of the State of Mississippi, should come here and demand that this Government should settle those demands—what would Mr. President Tyler and his Secretary answer? He (Mr. A.) thought they would have applications of that sort, and he would presume that the President would not answer them; but not answering a demand between sovereign States, was not getting rid of that demand. This Government would have—and this House would have, they might take his word for it—applications that would require answering at some time or other, to that effect. Now he would suppose the case that the Government of Holland, or the Government of Great Britain—whose subjects were suffering under the scruples of the Government of the State of Mississippi, whether that State was or was not bound to pay those debts,—he would suppose that those subjects called upon their Governments, saying that the people of those States had received their money—that they had promised repayment, and that they had refused to pay, and then those subjects called upon their Government to interfere; those Governments would say, This is one of the States of your Union, and you are bound to pay their debts. Suppose, then, the President and the Secretary of State did not choose to answer; and suppose one or both of those Governments should declare war against the State or Mississippi, and should send their steamers up to Natchez, if they could get there: would the refusal of the State of Mississippi to pay her bonds prevent this Government being called upon to assist her? They are invaded—martial law is declared—and he thought they would hear something about the obligation of this Union to stand by its members in case of war and invasion and the declaration of martial law. Governor McNutt foresaw this state of things, but he did not care to avoid it. Now, if they would not pay their debts, the Paixhan guns of those foreign Governments might go there, perhaps; and on the question whether the State of Mississippi was strictly bound to meet her obligations, there would be another mode of reasoning applied. And, in that case, what would this Government do? Would they abandon one of the States of this Union to the hands of the enemy? Or would they feel compelled to pay the bonds, for which such State had been willing to go to war? Twenty one millions of dollars had just been exacted from China, in addition to a sum before exacted, as the payment of a debt of not a dissimilar character. Suppose, then, the State of Mississippi required not only to pay the amount of her bonds, but twenty-one millions of dollars to defray the expenses of those Paixhan guns, which should reduce her to the necessity of subscribing to anything—what would this Government do? Was it prepared to stand by, and say "It is nothing to us? This is a question between the State of Mississippi and foreign Governments; and it is nothing to us. We cannot interfere; we must be neutral between these of this Congress—at the very last hour of the third session of Congress, to proclaim to this country that he had no opinion on the ways and means!

Mr. FILLMORE begged permission to explain.

Mr. WISE said he should like to have an explanation.

Mr. FILLMORE explained that he meant he had formed no opinion independent of executive communications.

Mr. WISE asked the gentleman if he believed the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury was correct.

Mr. FILLMORE replied that he had no means of showing its incorrectness, and he had no reason to believe that the Secretary was a dishonest man.

Mr. WISE inquired if the gentleman from New York believed in the data of the Secretary?

Mr. BOTTS rose to a question of order. The gentleman from Virginia had no right to poll the members of the Committee of Ways and Means in this way.

Mr. FILLMORE rose to explain.

Mr. WISE begged the reporters to take note of the gentleman's explanation. And what was it? It was this: "I have no opinion independent of the information of the Secretary of the Treasury." What is your opinion about the information of the Secretary of the Treasury? "I have no means of showing that it is incorrect." Well, now, what was the gentleman's opinion at last? Nothing at all. The gentleman from New York said, the other day, that if the data of the Secretary were correct, why then his calculations were correct.

He (Mr. W.) asked if the Secretary's data were correct; and the reply was, "I have no means of knowing whether they are correct or incorrect." And this came from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who confessed that, independent of the Secretary of the Treasury, he had got no opinion at all. Did they believe that he had got no opinion? The gentleman did not say he had got no opinion; but though he had got no specific opinion, he (Mr. W.) believed he had a general conclusion as to the correction of those data. Now, he asked for the motive for the concealment of those opinions. He asked why there was not a report from that committee?

Mr. FILLMORE asked the gentleman from Virginia if he believed the report made by the Secretary of the Treasury, as he was nearer the Executive than he (Mr. F.) could be; or whether the gentleman from Virginia had any means of knowing that it was false.

Mr. WISE. This is not a question of falsehood. [Laughter.] He begged gentlemen to wait for an answer before they laughed. He told the gentleman from New York that he differed wholly from the Secretary of the Treasury. Had they got their answer? [Laughter.] Now, would the gentleman answer him a question? Did the gentleman from New York believe in the correctness of the Secretary's report? [Cries of "That's fair."] Now, let gentlemen laugh. He (Mr. W.) differed from the Secretary of the Treasury, and he believed his data would be found to be a sandy foundation, and that the superstructure based upon it must fall necessarily.

The gentleman pursued these remarks in this strain some time, and expressed his dread of an extra session, and his desire to avoid its necessity.

Mr. FILLMORE replied, and Mr. WISE rejoined.

Mr. FILLMORE said he was glad to hear this declaration from the gentleman. If that gentleman, standing upon this floor, and speaking the sentiments of this Administration, declared that an extra session ought not to be called, and that there were no reasons for it, he (Mr. F.) was truly glad to hear it. As to whether the Committee of Ways and Means had discharged their duty or not, he had but little to say. The present was the short session; and, during its continuance, the Committee of Ways and Means had to perform the duty of examining a double set of appropriation bills—for the half calendar year, and for the fiscal year. They had also before them a proposition to bring back into the treasury money which was said to have been hitherto squandered; also, the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury that means should be provided for carrying the department through the year to the 1st of January next; and also the exchequer project, which had occupied much of their time. These were the duties which they had to perform during this short session. Whether the committee had been diligent or not, it was for the House to say. With what ability the duties had been performed, it certainly did not become him to say. But if it was a fact (as conceded by the President in the message just read) that it was the duty of the Executive to inform the House as to the state of the finances of the country, he put it to the gentleman to point out a single fact which indicated that the Committee of Ways and Means had abandoned all measures to carry the Government through the year. The committee took up the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which that officer stated that there would be enough means to carry on the Government through the half calendar year, and through the fiscal year to June, 1844, and then leave a million and a half in the treasury. When doubt began to be expressed as to the accuracy of the Secretary's calculations, the committee, unconnected as they were by any near relations to the Administration, caused inquiries to be made of the Secretary, with a view of affording him an opportunity to revise his estimates. Therefore it was that he addressed a letter to the Secretary, calling on him for the amount which he estimated would be received and paid out during the year.

He would say to the House, that it was in the power of the Executive, if he saw fit, to exhaust the treasury, for the purpose of calling an extra session of Congress. Such a thing might be done; if it was done, the Executive would be responsible for the extra session.

It was known that large appropriations would be made by this Congress, to lie over until next year. Now, it was only necessary for the President, in the exercise of his power to control the expenditures of these appropriations, to exhaust the treasury, by paying them over before they were absolutely needed; and thus create the very necessity (an extra session) which the gentleman deplored. If there should be no more expended during the year than what was appropriated by Congress for that period, he should say that, in his opinion, the ways and means of the treasury would be sufficient. He only asked that the Government might be administered as it had been in years past. In such an event, he did believe that the means of the treasury would prove sufficient. He believed he had said all that was necessary on this head.

As to the instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means, moved by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] all he had to say was; that he deemed them unnecessary. They implied a censure upon the committee; and he knew not what duty they had omitted which called for censure upon them. The committee had never neglected to consider carefully anything that was recommended by the Executive.

Mr. WISE then rose and withdrew his motion to reconsider the printing of the message; after which,

The House adjourned.

Mr. EVANS presented a memorial from citizens of the State of Maine, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, presented a memorial from Lubec, Maine, praying such legislation on the part of Congress as will produce greater reciprocity in our commercial regulations with foreign powers: ordered to lie on the table.

On motion by Mr. WOODBURY, leave was granted to Molly Luther, Mary Chase, Daniel Peck, and George Johnson, to withdraw their petitions and papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from Ruth Milligan, praying that the sum of $230 continental notes, paid to her husband, since deceased, for his services during the revolutionary war, may be made good to her or her children, by such general and equitable law as may be finally passed on the subject. Mr. L. remarked that, if any committee should be hereafter raised to take into consideration the subject of paying the debts of the States, he would move the reference of this petition to that committee. It struck him, however, that there would be more propriety in paying off the old revolutionary debt, before the idea of assuming the debts of the States was entertained. For the present, he moved that the petition be laid on the table. Agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the amendments of the House to the Senate bill for the relief of William Du Buys, postmaster at New Orleans, reported the bill back, with a recommendation that the Senate concur in the amendments.

The question was put, and the Senate concurred.

Mr. CHOATE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented joint resolutions, adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to vote for the abolishment of the Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York, and for the adoption of such a plan of military instructions as will be impartial in its operations, and consistent with the spirit and genius of our liberal institutions; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, made a report, (which was ordered to be printed,) adverse to the passage of the House bill for the relief of Major Thomas Harrison.

On motion by Mr. BATES, leave was granted to Thomas Flanagan to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate, instructing that committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the system of revenue cutters, and to employ a part of the navy of the United States in that service, made a report, (which was ordered to be printed,) accompanied by a resolution, declaring that it was inexpedient to adopt the recommendations of the resolution.

Mr. H., from the same committee, to which had been referred House bill entitled "An act to reduce the number and compensation of the officers and others employed in the port of New York," reported it back, with an amendment to strike out the preamble.

Mr. WOODBURY submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate of the net amount of revenue received from the customs in the month of January, 1843, according to the current returns made to the Treasury Department.

Mr. LINN presented a petition from Markham Tristoe, late postmaster at Warren, Benton county, Missouri, praying that the amount of a judgment obtained against him in the circuit court of the United States from the Missouri district may be refunded to him: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, presented a petition from Abraham Wilcox, representing that he is the father of twenty-two children, praying aid of the Government to raise a company to go to the Oregon Territory, and for grants of land, &c.; which was read, and laid on the table.

The resolution of the Committee on Commerce, to discharge that committee from the further consideration of the resolution of the Senate of the 27th of December last, directing it to inquire into the state of our tonnage, freights, and commerce, and to report whether they were prosperous under our existing regulations with foreign powers, &c., and to refer the same to the Secretary of State, and directing him to make the inquiries touching the matter, and to report thereon at the next session of Congress, was taken up; and, after a few remarks by Messrs. HUNTINGTON and WOODBURY, was adopted.

The following resolution introduced by Mr. BENTON on yesterday, was taken up for consideration; and, after a few remarks by Mr. ARCHER, not in opposition to its adoption, but expressing the belief that the call was unlike any ever made, it was agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the commission, or letter of instruction, which may have been given to Daniel Webster, Esq., Secretary of State, to treat with Lord Ashburton, late special minister from Great Britain to the United States.

The engrossed joint resolution directing the transfer of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, to the State of Maryland, and to the cities of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, on certain conditions, came up for a third reading.

Mr. KING remarked that one of the conditions in the bill on which the stock was surrendered, was, that the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal shall be completed to Cumberland. He inquired of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] whether he considered that the terms of the bill were such as authorized the Government to reclaim the stock in case the terms of the bill were not complied with.

Mr. MERRICK replied that, if the conditions were not complied with, the whole of the stock would revert to the Government.

The resolution was then read the third time, and passed.

The joint resolution for the distribution of certain copies of the Census Returns and Compendium of the Sixth Census, was read the third time and passed.

The bill relating to the appointment of Assistant Postmasters General, vesting the power to appoint them in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, was read a third time, and passed.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BERRIEN said that he had given notice to the Senate on yesterday, that he would on to-day move to fix a day for the consideration of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law. He was disposed to give notice that he would on Monday next ask the Senate to take that bill up for consideration. He said that it was desirable that the information obtained from the Secretary of State, as to the operations of the law, and the report of the committee on the subject, should be as widely disseminated as possible before they were called upon to act finally upon the bill; and it was desirable to give further time to Senators to consider the report of the Judiciary Committee, and the amendments recommended by it. He supposed that all that was desired by delay could be accomplished by Monday next.

Mr. YOUNG preferred that the bill should be then taken up, and made the special order for Monday next; but, on being informed that such course would place the bill behind other special orders, he acquiesced in the suggestion of Mr. BERRIEN.

RETRENCHMENT, ECONOMY, AND GOVERNMENT RESOURCES.

The resolutions introduced on Tuesday last by Mr. McDUFFIE, on the propriety of adopting measures to revive commerce, replenish the impoverished exchequer, and to arrest the accumulation of public debt, by reducing the tariff of the last session to a revenue standard, and by practising a rigid system of retrenchment, economy, and accountability, came up for consideration.

Mr. EVANS (in reply to Mr. McDUFFIE's remarks of yesterday) addressed the Senate for upwards of two hours and a half, discussing at large the various topics involved in the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, and the additional resolutions which he had himself submitted.

At the outset, he remarked, it was with very great reluctance that he rose to occupy any portion of the time of the Senate at this late period of the session, when there were so many important and pressing matters demanding its attention, in the discussion of these resolutions—resolutions which he feared were to end in discussion alone. Nevertheless, as they were deemed of very great importance, (as they certainly were,) and had been discussed with ability by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] who always evidenced an ability in whatever he undertook to discuss, he felt it to be his duty as briefly as possible to submit such remarks as the hasty consideration of the subject would enable him to make. The resolutions of the honorable Senator were chiefly directed to the condition of the treasury—to the finances and commerce of the country; and a very large portion of the speech with which the Senator had favored the Senate was directed to the condition of the business of the country, which he (Mr. E.) admitted were inseparably connected. He agreed with the Senator fully and thoroughly, that the commerce of the country was crippled to a very great extent, and that business was deeply embarrassed. He would not differ from the honorable Senator as to the terms of the resolution, which proposed a system of economy and retrenchment, and of limiting the expenses of Government to the income which may be derived by the treasury from all sources. He would agree with the Senator, that the commerce of the country was greatly embarrassed and crippled; but he differed from him radically as to the causes which had occasioned it, and as to the efficacy of the measures which he proposed to revive it.

Mr. E. then proceeded to a minute investigation of the measures which he conceived had led to the derangements of the currency, to which he mainly attributed the distresses of the country. He vindicated the course which he and the friends with whom he had acted took in defence of the State banks, after they had been stimulated by the Government and broken down, and when the Administration turned round on them, and endeavored to destroy them.

Having disposed of this branch of the subject, he adverted to the position assumed in the Senator's resolutions—that the tariff law was the cause of the condition of the country, and that a revision of that law would resuscitate commerce. He contended that the commerce of the country was twofold—foreign and domestic; and that the one was dependent on the other; so that, if domestic commerce languished and fell into decay, so must foreign commerce. It was, therefore, more reasonable to trace the crippled state of foreign commerce to causes which had operated on domestic commerce, than to what the Senator contends was for the protection and benefit of the home manufacturing interests identified with domestic commerce. In tracing out their causes, he (Mr. E.) had satisfied himself that they had their origin in the want of a sound currency of uniform value in every part of the Union. This, he contended, was the great source of the evils under which the country labored.

In speaking of the condition of the treasury, and its resources, he assumed that the dutiable imports of the year 1843 would be forty-two millions—yielding a revenue from customs of thirteen or fourteen millions of dollars. He estimated that the actual expenditures of the Government, independent of the interest on debt, would not exceed twenty-two millions of dollars for the year and a half ending 30th June, 1844. He combated the idea that the debt could, by any possibility, reach to what had been assumed by some—thirty or forty millions before the end of the year. It did not at present exceed twenty-five millions; and could not be increased one dollar without a law of Congress to that effect; of which there was no possible chance now, at this late period of the session. The reductions and retrenchments effected by Congress in the appropriation bills rendered it certain that the Government could get along very well, and without the slightest embarrassment, by being allowed to re-issue treasury notes already authorized. Those bearing interest were already at a premium, and would naturally stay out without any effort; and it would be only necessary to allow the treasury notes falling due this year to bear interest, to keep them out too, and prevent them from embarrassing the treasury.

Mr. E. attributed to the passage of the tariff law of last session the revival of the credit of the Government, and the high appreciation of the Government stocks in the money market.

Speaking of his resolutions, to the effect that it is the duty of the several States to make provision for meeting their engagements, and sustaining their credit, he contended that the General Government had a right to make that declaration, without incurring the censure of the States, inasmuch as the depreciation of their credit reacted on the credit of the United States; and besides, as a creditor of some of those States, at least to the amount of six or seven millions, the United States was entitled to the rights of a creditor, in regard to expressing its opinions.

He also maintained that the General Government, being the Government of the same people who owned the States themselves, was bound to render those States, in their necessity, whatever assistance it was in its power to afford. How that was to be done, was a matter of consideration, and could not, at this late period of the session, become a proper subject of discussion.

Mr. E. concluded by proposing the following amendment to the resolution of Mr. McDUFFIE: for which see proceedings of the 15th Feb.

Mr. DAYTON moved to strike out the last three resolutions of the amendment, with a view to insert the following:

Resolved, That the distrust and obloquy cast upon the Federal Government by reason of the failure of certain States to make prompt payment of their debts, is an unjust and unfounded imputation upon its credit and good faith; that, while this Government deplores the misguided policy of those States which have embarrassed themselves, it disclaims all liability, legally or morally, for such delinquency; while, in vindication of its own unblemished faith and honor, it appeals with confidence to its past history.

Mr. D. then remarked that he had no disposition to embark in the general discussion which had arisen on these resolutions; but, having submitted this amendment to one of the resolutions, he would feel gratified if the Senate would afford him a few moments in which to express his views on the subject of his amendment. It was very desirable to him that the matter should be postponed till to-morrow, pledging himself to occupy the Senate but a few minutes at that time.

Mr. RIVES remarked that he wished to submit a paper which he had prepared, expressing his own views on the subject-matter brought into the discussion on these resolutions. It was not then in order to submit this paper as an amendment to the resolutions pending; but, with the leave of the Senate, he would present it with the view—if the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] was rejected—of submitting it as a substitute for the last three resolutions of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. EVANS] The paper was read.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped that both of the amendments proposed, and the paper submitted by the honorable Senator from Virginia, would be received and printed. They were received, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK remarked that he was exceedingly sorry to find that, when there were just about two weeks of the session left, a general discussion was likely to be opened up on a proposition out of which no practical good could grow. If the discussion was permitted to progress, the whole session would be consumed in unprofitable debate. He therefore rose for the simple purpose of giving notice to the Senate that on to-morrow, as soon after the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] as he could get the floor, he would move to lay the whole of the propositions on the table; and he trusted that all those Senators who were anxious to proceed with the practical business of the session would be in their places, and sustain, by their votes, the proposition he intended to make.

Mr. ALLEN did not believe that the discussion which was suggested on the introduction of the resolutions of the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] was unprofitable or unwise; and if he had even supposed that such was the case with reference to those resolutions, he should have changed his opinion after the introduction of the several propositions now laid before that body. The proposition submitted as an amendment to the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, intended to present to the Senate the question of the assumption of the debts of the States, having come before them on the responsibility of a Senator, it would be unbecoming in the Senate, in the present emergency, not to meet the question fully, fairly, and openly. He then said he rose for the purpose of expressing the hope that, under no circumstances, would the Senate agree to the motion which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] intimated his intention to submit. The language of the resolutions of the Senator from Virginia admonished them of the consequences which would be fairly deduced if the Senate adopted this side way of disposing of the question; that delusive hopes would be entertained that this Government would endorse the faltering credit of the States, by directly or indirectly assuming their debts. Such (said he) would be the effect of the failure on the part of the Senate to express its opinion on the subject. The negative act of a failure to express an opinion against the assumption, would be construed as giving a shadow of countenance to the scheme. He appealed to the Senate to meet the question fairly, and to make the vote of laying the resolutions on the table a test question.

Mr. BUCHANAN was very much impressed with the same considerations expressed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK,] that a protracted discussion on these resolutions and amendments would obstruct the pressing and necessary business of Congress yet to be acted upon this session. There were but fifteen days of the session yet unexpired, during which a very large number of public and private bills must be acted upon. No compensating benefit could be expected from the discussion of mere abstract questions leading to no action; for experience had shown that resolutions of this kind were, from time to time, offered and discussed at former sessions, for weeks upon weeks, without leading to any practical results. He instanced several occasions, within a few years back, in which much time had been devoted to abstract discussions. At the same time, as the question of the assumption of the State debts, or of assisting the States to get out of their indebtedness, had been mooted, he concurred in the opinion that it was now necessary to have some unequivocal expression of the sentiments of the Senate on that point, and would be glad if it could be brought up either in the form proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] or in some other form; for he desired an opportunity to give expression to his sentiments. But he feared so much discussion would take place, and so many subjects of controversy would be opened up before the amendment of the Senator from Virginia could come up, that an opportunity would not be afforded of taking the vote of the Senate directly on the question; and he could, therefore, wish it had been brought forward by the Senator as a distinct proposition, on which a vote could be taken directly. He (Mr. B.) would, however, call upon the chairman of the Finance Committee to make a report on the memorials and petitions which had been referred to that committee in such numbers during the session, and hoped he would be prepared, in a day or two, to make that report.

Mr. EVANS said that no petitions were before the committee on the subject of the assumption of the State debts.

Mr. BUCHANAN said there were great numbers of petitions and memorials referred to the committee on the subject of issuing Government scrip, based on the public lands, to the amount of $200,000,000, for the relief of the States, which was the same thing.

Mr. EVANS replied that petitions in relation to a currency of two hundred millions of dollars of that kind had been referred to the committee; but they had nothing to say about the assumption of the State debts.

Mr. BUCHANAN referred the Senator to the very last petition he (Mr. B.) had presented, and which had been referred to the committee.

Mr. ARCHER concurred with the Senator from Ohio, that, the question having come before the Senate—no matter in what shape, or how—it would not now do to give it the go-by; and that there ought to be a direct vote upon it. He also concurred with the Senator from Maryland, in the necessity of applying the remaining time of the session to the real, practical business of legislation. He hoped, therefore, the suggestion he would throw out would meet the unanimous concurrence of every Senator. It was, that, after the Senator from New Jersey (who is entitled to the floor, and to whom it is in courtesy due) shall have expressed his views to-morrow, the vote on the amendments, in their order, and then on the resolutions, will be suffered to be taken without further debate.

Mr. DAYTON, seeing that the sense of the Senate was in favor of a speedy termination of a discussion which, if it proceeded, would obstruct the public business, would most cheerfully waive any intention he had of accompanying his amendment with a few remarks.

Mr. ARCHER was sorry the Senator waived his right to the floor; for he was assured, even if any indulgence were implied in the opportunity, it was fully due, and would be gladly accorded to a Senator who had so seldom availed himself of his privilege to address the Senate. He (Mr. A) would suggest that, as soon as the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey shall have been disposed of, the direct vote on the question, which it seemed now so necessary to meet openly and frankly, could be taken on the amendment proposed by his honorable colleague, [Mr. RIVES;] and that being disposed of, on any other amendments to be offered, and finally on the resolutions themselves, without any debate.

Mr. RIVES said he very cheerfully waived any right of accompanying his resolutions with any remarks, in accordance with the suggestion of his colleague.

Mr. WALKER thought, as the Senator from New Jersey had waived his right to speak, and the Senator from Virginia had done the same, there could be no difficulty in the way of proceeding at once to the vote, and the whole matter might be disposed of in half an hour.

Mr. CALHOUN objected, that there was not, at that late hour, a full attendance of Senators; and it was extremely desirable every Senator should have an opportunity of recording his vote upon such a momentous subject. He would, therefore, suggest the propriety of agreeing, by general consent, to take the vote at one o'clock to-morrow, and let it be understood that a full attendance will be expected at that hour.

Mr. SIMMONS did not understand the additional resolution on the subject of State credit, which was offered by the Senator from Maine, had any bearing whatever on the question of the assumption of the State debts. He thought it would be very difficult to take silent votes on such incongruous resolutions and amendments; for if all were adopted, they would make a string of contradictions.

Mr. MERRICK should persist in his notice, that if the discussion was to proceed, he should move to morrow to lay the whole subject on the table. He would do this, not to evade any question, but simply to get forward with the public business. At such a late period of the session, it was insufferable that every possible question of agitation which distracted the country should be got up to the total annihilation of all the practical legislative duties of Congress.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved an adjournment; but gave way to

Mr. LINN, who submitted a resolution which he had intended to offer in the morning hour. After which,

Mr. McDUFFIE observed that, yielding to the very forcible reasons urged by the Senator from Maryland, much as he desired to answer some of the remarks of the Senator from Maine, he would waive all right of reply, on the understanding that the question on the amendments and resolutions would be taken to-morrow, at 1 o'clock, without debate.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 14, 1843.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD of Maine presented a petition signed by certain widows of officers and soldiers of the revolutionary war, to wit: Jane Record, Abigail Record, Miriam Hull, Margaret Tobin, Hannah Lombard, Betsey Penfilly, Sarah French, Sylva Conant, Lucy Bailey, Mary Stevens, Margaret Cushman, Mary Needham, Rachel Field, Anna Gold, Sarah Perkins, Mary Hubbard, Sarah Sturtevant, Elizabeth Fletcher, Mary Holmes, Mary Fuller, Jennet Washburn, Polly Soule, Naomi Briggs, Mehitable Perkins, Anna Tucker, and Sarah Gardner, residing in Buckfield and vicinity, Oxford county, Maine, praying for an extension of the pension law of July 7, 1838; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union—a bill for that purpose being now before that committee.

Mr. BOWNE presented the petition of Frederick Juliand and 29 other citizens of Greene, Chenango county, New York, praying that Congress will promptly act upon and adopt the exchequer, or plan of finance, as recommended by the President.

Mr. McKEON presented the petition of inhabitants of the city of New York, praying for a reduction of the expenses of the National Government, the abolition of the franking privilege, and a reduction of the rates of postage.

Mr. J. T. MASON laid on the table additional papers in relation to the claim of Jona. Shafer of Washington county, Maryland: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. JACK presented the petition of 117 citizens of Clearfield county, in Pennsylvania, praying the establishment of a mail route along the Snow Shoe turnpike, in said county: referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

EXCHEQUER.

Mr. BARNARD rose and inquired if there was a special order for to-morrow.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BARNARD then said that, without moving any special order, he should ask the House to go into committee on Thursday, with a view to take up the exchequer bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and the substitute for that bill submitted by himself. He wished that subject to have preference over all other business.

Mr. ARNOLD obtained the floor, and was about to call up the special order, (bill No. 548;) when

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON wished to know whether the special order overrode all other business, the morning hour included.

The SPEAKER said it did.

At the request of several gentlemen, Mr. ARNOLD yielded the floor, with a view to the reception of reports from committees.

Mr. J. T. MASON presented a petition from the State of Maryland, numerously signed, asking for the relief of Amos Kendall from the fine imposed on him by the circuit court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MALLORY, from the select committee on the coast survey, made a report.

Mr. ARNOLD presented a petition from the city of New York, numerously signed, praying a reduction of postages, and the passage of bill No. 548. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee on Claims, made an adverse report upon the claim of John J. Bulow.

Mr. RANDALL of Maine, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Blooming Youth; a bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Dove, of Lippican; and a bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Flovilla: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. R. also reported several Senate bills, without amendment.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a joint resolution in relation to bounty land patents: read a third time, and passed.

Mr. H. also made an adverse report upon the petition of Cadwallader Wallace.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to confirm the sale of public lands in certain cases. Read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. T. also reported Senate bills "to perfect the titles to lands south of the Arkansas river, held under New Madrid locations, and pre-emption rights under the act of 1814," and "An act in relation to the two per cent. fund of the State of Mississippi." Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to regulate the mode of paying over to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund relinquished to said State by the act commonly known as the distribution act of 1841.

After a short debate, in which Messrs. BRIGGS, CHAPMAN, GWIN, STANLY, and JACOB THOMPSON participated, the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THE WAREHOUSING SYSTEM.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY said he was instructed by the Committee on Commerce to state that it was their desire that the warehousing bill should be taken up, and a day set apart for its consideration. As there appeared to be some doubt whether the House would consider the bill this session or not, he moved to make it the special order for this day week, for the purpose of testing the sense of the House as to their disposition to act upon it. He made the motion, and desired the vote on it to be considered as a test.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON inquired if the motion was in order.

The SPEAKER said it was not.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY said he would take an early opportunity of making the motion he had intimated.

THE DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, said he was instructed to report a resolution to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill for the recharter of the District banks. He wished the vote on the resolution to be made a test vote.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to extend the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, being House bill No. 676.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that the resolution be laid on the table, and asked the yeas and nays on the motion.

They were taken, and resulted—yeas 87, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Bordes, Bowne, Brewster, A. V. Brown, C. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Doan, Eastman, John Edwards, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Linn, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, John Thomson Mason, Mathews, Miller, Mitchell, Newhard, Partridge, Pickens, Plumer, Reed, Reding, Reynolds, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shields, William Smith, Snyder, Steenrod, Stratton, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Van Buren, Weller, Westbrook, Joseph L. Williams, Wood, and John Young—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, M. Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, William Butler, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Crawford, Garrett Davis, Deberry, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, James, William Cost Johnson, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, McKennan, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Pearce, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Rencher, Ridgway, Rigg, Rodney, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Shepperd, Slade, Truman Smith, Sprigg, Stanly, Stokely, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, John T. Stuart, Summers, Taliaferro, Richard W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trotti, Trumbull, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Warren, Washington, Edward D. White, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Yorke, and Augustus Young—108.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution. He said to extend the charter of six banks in this District for ten years, without one moment's consideration or debate, was an outrage upon all propriety in legislation.

The resolution was then adopted—yeas 114, nays 98, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Boardman, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, William Butler, Calhoun, Thomas J. Williams, and John Young—98.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL rose, to move that the bill 649 be made the special order of the day for Thursday next.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order to make that motion, unless by general consent.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL hoped general consent would be given; for the bill was a very important one. [It was understood to be the bill to suspend the operation of the districting section of the apportionment bill, under the late census.]

Mr. BARNARD appealed to the gentleman from South Carolina to allow committees to be called for reports, before he introduced his motion.

The SPEAKER said the calling of committees for reports was the business in order; and he continued the call, beginning with the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a joint resolution relating to certain public property purchased for the United States in the city of Detroit. It was read twice, and ordered to be printed.

JESSE HOYT.

Mr. BARNARD said he was directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a resolution for the printing of the memorial of Jesse Hoyt, which was presented to the House a few days ago.

Mr. BOARDMAN requested permission to make a personal explanation on that subject, as he had been abused by that man [Jesse Hoyt] in the newspapers. He then went on, by general consent, to make some statements of the reasons he had for offering a resolution in this House on this subject at the last session, as Jesse Hoyt had attributed to him unworthy motives. He read extracts from the reports of the commissioners who were sent to investigate the affairs of the New York custom-house; from which he found that Jesse Hoyt—a man who was guilty of robbing the public treasury—had, in his character of collector, charged $201,508 in addition to his other fees allowed by the Government; and he had wished to know if the Government was in the habit of allowing such charges. He said he could not have had any personal object in abusing Jesse Hoyt, for he did not even know the man, though he believed he was introduced to him some years ago, when Jesse Hoyt bore the character of an honest man; but that was a long time ago. This explanation which he now made was, perhaps, unnecessary; and for occupying the time of the House with it, perhaps he ought to apologise; for the abuse of a rogue like Jesse Hoyt—who was cast off even by the subterranean Locofoco Democracy of New York, attached as they were to plunder—could affect no honest man.

Mr. BARNARD said the letter to which the gentleman from Connecticut referred—which had been published in the public papers—was one which no decent man could countenance; but the memorial (the printing of which he now moved) was respectful in its character.

Mr. ARNOLD interrupted the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] who was proceeding with his remarks, and said the debate was useless. He inquired if the morning hour had not expired, and expressed his anxiety that the House would not consume its time with useless discussions, when the day ought to be devoted to the special order—which was his bill No. 548.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman from Tennessee that committees were called for reports by general consent.

After some few observations from several gentlemen, the question of printing was negatived.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a Senate bill without amendment. It was an act altering the time of holding the circuit courts of the district of Connecticut; and as it was unobjectionable, it was read a third time and passed.

Mr. ARNOLD then moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON desired the gentleman to withdraw the motion, to enable him (Mr. CAVE JOHNSON) to make a report from the Select Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. EVERETT rose to a privileged question, amidst great confusion; and some explanation ensued between him and the Speaker, which was not audible at the reporter's desk.

MISSISSIPPI STATE BONDS.

Mr. GWIN rose, and desired permission to make a few remarks, which were of an explanatory character.

Mr. ARNOLD said there were at least twenty gentlemen who desired the floor; and he could not yield.

He, however, afterwards consented, on an explanation of Mr. GWIN's object.

Mr. GWIN asked the indulgence of the House a moment to enable him to reply to some statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] on Saturday last, as reported in the Intelligencer of yesterday morning. He would remark that, from the noise around him during the time the gentleman was addressing the House, he had not heard the gentleman make the statements as they are reported, or he would have corrected them at the time. The gentleman is reported to have said:

"Mr. GRANGER came not here to speak with disrespect of any man who had been elevated to the chief magistracy of one of the States of this confederacy; but let gentlemen, after the execution of these bonds—after the sale, delivery, and receipt of the $5,000,000—turn to the message of Governor McNutt, and what did they find? That he had yielded his individual opinions to the voice of the people of Mississippi! The bonds had been issued; there was no pretence that the $5,000,000 had not been received; but when the pay-day came, the morality of Mississippi pocketed the $5,000,000, and started back with holy horror at the idea of paying what they had received!"

Sir, (said Mr. GWIN,) this statement is a tissue of misrepresentations of fact—no doubt unintentional. The expression attributed to Governor McNutt was made in reference to signing the bank charter, and not to the sale of the bonds. As to the statement that there was no pretence that the five millions of dollars had not been received, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. It is not the fact—not a word of it; for the main ground taken by the party in that State who are opposed to assuming the payment of these bonds, is, that the money was never received by the State, but by the bank; for whose acts and debts the State is not liable, as the act under which it was organized is unconstitutional and of no effect, so far as the liability of the State is concerned. As to having pocketed the five millions, and starting back with horror when pay-day came, there is more poetry than truth in it. The State has always been willing to appropriate every dollar of the assets of the bank to the payment of the bonds, except that portion which has been paid to the bank by repudiation under the bankrupt law, and thus passed out of the control of the bank. He presumed the gentleman entertained no holy horror at thus destroying the means of the bank to pay these bonds, to the amount of one or two millions of dollars.

The gentleman stated further, that the bonds were sold above par. This is not the fact. They were sold under par, if gold and silver was to be the standard, and on a credit; in both respects violating the unconstitutional supplement under which they were issued. The bank sold her checks upon this fund at a premium, it is true, in exchange for her irredeemable depreciated paper. She first dishonored her paper, and then shaved the holders in selling her checks; and this is called selling her bonds above par.

He would detain the House no longer at present; yet he would, before the session closed, pay his respects to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] as a teacher of morals to the State of Mississippi, as it may be instructive to the people of that State to know who the honor-and-dignity party there had selected as their champion here.

Mr. GRANGER said, before he proceeded to comment on the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, he would make a remark on another subject. He then quoted from the published reports of the debate between himself and the gentleman from Mississippi on a previous day.

Mr. G. then went on to say that he wished his disclaimer to be broad. He considered the matter as past. Unless his disclaimer had been made in good faith, it would not have been made at all. His remarks were made after full advisement; and, had his intention been to insult the gentleman from Mississippi, no disclaimer whatever would have been offered.

Mr. GWIN wished to know whether he was to understand the gentleman as having said or implied anything derogatory to him.

Mr. GRANGER said he did not mean to attack the character of the gentleman from Mississippi. He wished the House and the nation to pass upon what had occurred between them.

Mr. GWIN said he wished to know distinctly, inasmuch as the gentleman had alluded to the subject, whether he attributed to him any conduct unbecoming a member of the House of Representatives and a gentleman.

Mr. GRANGER said, no; he did not intend to assail, in any manner, the conduct or motives of the gentleman from Mississippi. He further stated that he felt it due to himself to say that the word "brag," at the conclusion of his printed speech, was not used by him.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi (Mr. GRANGER yielding the floors) said he wished to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to other portions of his reported remarks. That gentleman stated that, in making the motion he did a few days since, his (Mr. T.'s) objects were two-fold: one was to get up a political excitement; the other was to bring into disrepute the credit of the United States. Now (Mr. T. said) he was incapable of acting in his representative capacity with any such objects or motives. His whole course in this House was a refutation of the charges; and to make such allegations was doing him a manifest injustice.

Mr. GRANGER said he did suppose that the gentleman wished to get up a political discussion upon this subject, and he also supposed that the gentleman wished, by getting up such a discussion, to throw upon the majority in Congress the responsibility of having brought the credit of the Government of the United States into disrepute.

Mr. THOMPSON rose and said that, in thus supposing, he supposed what was false.

Mr. GRANGER. What did you say?

Mr. THOMPSON said that, in supposing him to act with the imputed objects, he [Mr. GRANGER] supposed what was false.

Mr. GRANGER resumed, and proceeded to vindicate himself from the charge that he had unjustly declared that, after receiving $5,000,000 upon bonds sold, the State of Mississippi had repudiated those very bonds. He had stated no more than what he could prove. He had stated that, under the laws of Mississippi, the Governor of that State was authorized to sign a large amount of the bonds of the Union Bank, and to subscribe to $5,000,000 of the stock of that institution. The Governor did sign the bonds, and did subscribe to the stock of the bank. The bonds—to the amount of $5,000,000—were sold, and the money paid, and became the capital of the bank. The bonds were sold for $5,080,000; being a premium of $80,000.

Mr. GWIN rose to make a correction. The bank issued post notes, which were irredeemable, and under par. It sold its checks on the Bank of the United States for irredeemable paper, which never was at par with gold and silver. The bonds were sold under par, and payment received in irredeemable paper, contrary to law, and in violation both of the charter of the bank, and of the supplemental charter, which was passed subsequently.

Mr. GRANGER resumed, and disclaimed the idea of intending to speak disrespectfully of the Governor of any State in the Union. He then went into an examination of the condition and history of the Union Bank of Mississippi—contending that the supplemental charter, now so universally condemned, was passed by 14 Whigs and 36 Democrats. Its charter was signed by the Governor; and subsequently he signed $5,000,000 of bonds, in accordance with that charter. The bonds were sold, and the money received into the Union Bank. How did the authorities of Mississippi then treat this institution? They recognised it as a bank, and declared that the dividends on the $5,000,000 should go towards internal improvement and education. Subsequently, the State borrowed $75,000 of the bank, and then $25,000 more. It caused certain lots in Jackson city to be sold, and received in payment promissory notes, which it caused to be discounted as mercantile paper at this same Union Bank. Mr. G. read from the message of Gov. McNutt in 1841, in which the Governor treated of the finances of the State, and the transactions with the Union Bank. It would be perceived, by reading the message, that the Governor declared that he had yielded to the public will in what he had done.

Mr. GWIN said that the Governor did not allude to the sale of the bonds, when he said he had yielded to the public will, contrary to his own opinions; but referred to his having signed the charter of the bank.

Mr. GRANGER resumed, and reiterated the positions which he had previously assumed. He contended that the Governor had signed the bonds, and complained that he had to bear the odium of acts which he did not sanction. He read a letter, written in May, in which it was stated that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. GWIN]—who was to be the bearer—would explain the causes of the non-payment of the bonds, &c.

Mr. GWIN said that the letter referred to by the gentleman was written by Judge Turner, of the Supreme Court of Mississippi. He (Mr. G.) had never heard of it until it appeared in print. The judge wrote to him, after the publication, asking if he (Mr. G.) recollected having carried the letter, and also whether he remembered having a conversation with him (Judge T.) upon the subject; to which he replied, that he recollected neither the one nor the other.

Mr. GRANGER said the letter to which he referred was written to show that the Union Bank never received but $5,000,000 on the bonds.

Mr. GWIN said the letter was written after the bonds were issued.

Mr. GRANGER said it was true; but the Governor signed the bonds.

Mr. GWIN. Nobody doubts that.

Mr. GRANGER resumed, and, after some further remarks, concluded by saying that, had the State of Mississippi, yielding to the force of hard times, asked the world for time to pay her obligations, instead of repudiating them, her action would not have had the disastrous effect on the credit of the country which was now experienced.

Here Mr. ARNOLD rose and claimed the floor.

Mr. GWIN wished five minutes to explain.

Mr. ARNOLD declined yielding.

RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of bill No. 548, in order that it might be acted on in the House at once.

Mr. FILLMORE suggested that the adoption of this motion would preclude all opportunity for amendment. He proposed to the gentleman to withdraw his motion and submit a resolution, that the Committee of the Whole shall proceed at 3 o'clock this day to vote upon all amendments offered, or that may be offered, to the bill.

Mr. ARNOLD accepted of the proposition.

The resolution for taking the bill out of committee at 3 o'clock to-day was then agreed to—ayes 92, noes 78.

On motion of Mr. ARNOLD the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, [Mr. BARNES in the chair.]

House bill No. 548, "A bill to reduce the compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives, and to the delegates of the Territories, and repealing all the laws on the subject," was taken up, and read through, together with the amendments made thereto by the Select Committee, to whom it had been referred at the last session of Congress.

The bill having been read,

Mr. GWIN offered the following as a substitute for the bill; which was read for information:

A BILL to retrench the expenditures of the Government of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the 30th day of June next, the pay and emoluments of all offices existing on the 4th day of March, (inclusive,) 1825, under the Government of the United States, whether civil, military, or naval, which have been increased since that period, shall be reduced to the rate at which they then were: Provided, That, in every case where the pay and emoluments of any office have been reduced since the 4th day of March, 1825, this act shall not be so construed as to change such reduction.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 30th day of June next, the pay and emoluments of every office under the Government of the United States, whether civil, military, or naval, created since the 4th of March, 1825, shall be reduced at the rate of twenty per centum.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no officer under the Government of the United States shall be allowed any extra compensation whatever.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the session of Congress shall be protracted beyond five months, the per diem pay of the members thereof, thereafter, shall be at the rate of four dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HUNT also offered the following as a substitute for the bill, which was read for information:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, instead of the daily compensation now allowed by law, there shall be paid, annually, to the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates from Territories, of every future Congress of the United States, the following sums, respectively, that is to say: To the President of the Senate pro tempore, when there is no Vice President, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, three thousand dollars each; to each Senator, (other than the President pro tempore, as aforesaid,) member of the House of Representatives, (other than the Speaker,) and Delegate, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the pay provided for in the first section of this act, each Senator, at every session of Congress, and every meeting of the Senate in the recess of Congress, after the 3d day of March, 1843, shall be allowed and paid four dollars for every twenty miles of estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting; and each Representative and Delegate of every future Congress shall be allowed and paid four dollars for every twenty miles of estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, at the commencement and end of every such session; and the aforesaid allowances shall be certified and paid, in the same manner as the daily compensation and travel fees to members of Congress have heretofore been.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts, on the subject of compensation to members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and Delegates of Territories, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, from and after the 3d day of March, 1843.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS asked leave to offer an amendment.

Mr. CUSHING observed that there would be time enough to offer amendments after the debate had closed. All these amendments were consuming the short time allowed for debate, and he must object to any more of them.

The CHAIR then stated that the bill having been referred to a select committee, and reported back, with amendments, by that committee, the regular order of proceeding would be, first to pass on the amendments of the committee, and such amendments as might be offered to them; and then to consider such amendments as might be offered by members of the House.

The amendments of the committee were then read; and the question was put on the first amendment proposed, substituting the 5th day of December next for the 1st day of November, [the time the bill is to go into operation,] and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MOORE offered several amendments, which were not heard; but the Chair decided them to be out of order.

Mr. CUSHING moved to strike out the first section of the bill; but the Chair decided the amendment not to be in order.

After a conversation on points of order by Messrs. CUSHING, MOORE, ARNOLD, BARNARD, and the CHAIR, during which there was a good deal of noise and confusion, and no practical result,

Mr. CUSHING moved that the committee rise; which motion was rejected—ayes 70, noes 73.

Mr. CUSHING then moved that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. ARNOLD claimed the floor, and said he would not yield it for any such motion. The gentleman might go on and discuss the pending amendment if he pleased.

Mr. CUSHING inquired of the Chair whether in this amendment he might discuss the question of the compensation of members of Congress generally.

The CHAIR said it would not be in order to do so.

Mr. CUSHING. Then I understand there is no way of discussing the merits of this bill.

The question was then put on the next amendment, which was to insert the word "mileage" in the 90th line, so as to make the sentence read "No Senator shall be allowed for mileage a sum exceeding six dollars per day"—but no quorum voting

The CHAIR made a count of the House, and ascertained that a quorum was present.

Mr. HOLMES then offered an amendment to the amendment, providing that no member of Congress shall receive a greater sum for mileage than his reasonable travelling expenses from the place of his residence to the seat of Government, together with $8 per day for every day's travel.

The CHAIRMAN inquired where the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina was intended to come in.

Mr. HOLMES replied. Anywhere you may think proper.

Mr. ARNOLD said if the amendment did not apply, he should object.

Mr. HOLMES suggested that it should come in after the word "mileage."

Great confusion ensued, in the course of which many gentlemen were on the floor speaking at the same time. Ultimately the committee agreed to rise, and the committee rose accordingly at half past 1 o'clock, and reported progress.

Mr. CUSHING then rose to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER inquired if it was of a personal nature.

Mr. CUSHING replied that the Chair would judge when he had made his motion; but he should have the opportunity to appeal, if the Chair should decide against him. He then moved a reconsideration of the vote by which it was agreed to fix on three o'clock to terminate debate in committee of the whole; and on that he moved the previous question, and called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER put the question on the motion for the previous question; and there was a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. CUSHING withdrew the call for the yeas and nays, but it was renewed in another quarter, and they were ordered. The yeas and nays were then taken, and the motion to reconsider was negatived—yeas 82, nays 110, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arrington, Atherton, Bidlack, Black, Botts, Bowne, Brewster, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—110.

Mr. MALLORY moved a call of the House.

Mr. ARNOLD was understood to deprecate that motion as unnecessary, and as a dodging of the question.

Mr. MALLORY said he never dodged anything; he always sailed under an open flag.

Mr. ARNOLD. Then meet the question now.

Mr. MALLORY. I will meet it now, and elsewhere, too.

The SPEAKER called the gentleman to order.

Mr. MALLORY called for tellers on his call for the yeas and nays; and Messrs. WELLER and BOARDMAN were appointed; and they reported a majority in favor of the yeas and nays; which being taken, resulted thus—yeas 65, nays 130.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole: agreed to.

The SPEAKER called Mr. GILMER to the chair.

Mr. GILMER asked to be excused. He could not undertake to keep order in the present state of the committee. Besides, he wished to offer some amendments himself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was then called to the chair, and the committee immediately resumed the consideration of bill No. 548.

Mr. ARNOLD claimed the floor.

Mr. HOLMES rose to a question of order, claiming the floor upon an amendment which he offered when the committee was last in session.

After some debate, in which Messrs. BRIGGS, HOLMES, BOWNE, ARNOLD, and the CHAIRMAN participated, it was decided that Mr. HOLMES might proceed.

The amendment offered by Mr. H. provided that no member of Congress shall receive for mileage a sum greater than his actual expenses in travelling to and from the seat of Government, and $3 per diem during the time occupied in so travelling.

The CHAIRMAN said that, although the amendment would make the section read very awkwardly, he ruled it admissible, as germane to the subject.

Mr. HOLMES said he did not care much whether the bill was to be passed in a symmetrical form or not. He went for the reform of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD;] and the only fault which he had to find with it was, that it did not reach the ultima thule. He was perfectly convinced that the present was the time to cut down the expenditures of this Government. If the opportunity was now lost to make a deep incision, Congress would never have it in their power again. The expenses of Congress were now so large, that he wondered the people continued to submit to them. He would not speak of their per diem, but to the exorbitant mileage. Whether the pay were fixed at eight or at six dollars a day, it would always give Western members an adequate sum. But this reduction would put others residing nearer the seat of Government in an awkward predicament. The main feature of a republican government was equality. Now, he should not feel himself upon an equality with many members, did he come here with as low a compensation as $6 a day. He argued that members residing near were liable to expenses, in exercising the rites of hospitality to their constituents, who frequently visited Washington, which members at a distance did not have to incur.

He also objected to the mileage now allowed, because it practised a deception upon the people, who supposed that members received only enough to pay their expenses, and give them a decent support. According to the bill now before the committee, they were yet to receive $6 for every 20 miles travelled. Now, the railroad cars would carry them 282 miles a day; which number, divided by 20, and multiplied by 6, would give the amount received for one day's travel in the cars—$84. He was for cutting down the mileage of the members.

As for cutting down the salaries of the cabinet ministers residing in Washington, he thought it unjust. Their present salary of $6,000, as many gentlemen on that floor knew, was wholly inadequate. He did not think they should be sheared of the little ability they now possessed to contribute to the hospitalities of the metropolis, and render our Government, through themselves, respectable in the eyes of foreign ministers. The gentleman who introduced the bill was estopped by the Constitution from making it applicable to the President and the judges. Was it not equally improper to cut down the salaries of the cabinet ministers, who bore a near relation to the President, and who had to remain here, not a few months, but all the year, and live independent of their business at home? They could not, like members of Congress, return to their farms, their merchandise, or their professions; but were compelled to remain all the year in an expensive town; therefore it was that he thought it would be extremely unjust to cut down their present salaries 20 per cent.

He begged the gentleman from Tennessee to assent to his amendment and his suggestions, since he would thereby, in case of the passage of the bill, achieve a great triumph. The bill would cut off about $2,000,000 from the expenses of the Government. If the gentleman did not assent to his amendment for reducing the mileage—coming, as he did, from a remote section of the Union, and therefore entitled to draw a heavy mileage—he would subject himself to the imputation of inconsistency. He declared here, in his place, that all the country demanded a retrenchment. What he protested against was, the cutting off a few of the outer branches of the tree. Unless it received an effectual pruning, it would not be in proportion to the roots which supported it, and which were now weak and decayed. Gentlemen must either consent to bring down the tariff to a revenue standard, or else reduce the expenditures of the Government to the measure of its revenue.

Now he observed, with great satisfaction, that the House received, yesterday, a communication from the President of the United States, and had it instantly referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. He was to judge, from that, that there were reformers on both sides of the House, willing to take the suggestions of the President, and to look into the present state of the country, and see whether its institutions can be preserved. He rejoiced that the Committee of Ways and Means had shaken off from themselves that indolence of responsibility which had hitherto kept them inactive, and were now about to take this matter in hand, and investigate it thoroughly. He hoped they would soon recommend some practical measure, and not suffer this Congress to adjourn without bringing in a tariff sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government; and that they would bring down those expenditures to a revenue tariff. He hoped that they would, disregarding particular or sectional interests—the interests of the hemp grower or the cotton manufacturer—provide for the economical expenditures of the Government, by laying the burdens of taxation equally on all. It was but six months ago that it was predicted by the gentleman from Boston [Mr. WINTHROP] that the present tariff would produce a revenue of twenty-six millions; and the result had proved that the sacrifice then made of the interests of the many for the benefit of a few, had greatly aggravated the financial embarrassments of the Government.

Mr. CUSHING observed that he should speak to the limited question embraced in the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HOLMES.] He did not believe that any portion of the people of the United States called for a reduction of the compensation of members of Congress, either in regard to their per diem or mileage; and he begged leave to call the attention of the committee to the remarkable fact, that they were at the very close of the session, with the prospect that but a small minority of the present members of the House would ever come back again. They were, therefore, legislating for their successors, and not for themselves; and reducing not their own compensation, but that of those who were to come after them. He utterly rejected the idea that, in consideration of any existing straits in the treasury, they should refuse adequate compensation to members of Congress, seeing that that treasury belonged to a rich, powerful, and growing people, both able and willing to pay their servants a fair and just compensation for their services. He denied that the compensation at present paid was too much. The Government of the United States was administered upon the assumption that its officers should be paid for their services, and not suffered, as in other Governments, to serve without pay, and derive their compensation from perquisites, or other indirect means. If members of Congress were not paid for their services, that hall would be filled, as was the case with the British House of Commons, with an opulent aristocracy, and those who were dependent on them. And if, again, they were to receive an inadequate compensation, the result would be the same, by compelling those who were poor to retire, and leave the way open to their richer competitors. It was a mistake, then, to suppose that the reduction of the pay of members of Congress was a Democratic measure. On the contrary, nothing could be more opposed to the principles of Democracy; for it would throw that House and its legislation into the hands of an aristocracy.

Mr. BERSON said the few minutes remaining would afford him time to define his main position on the bill. It was this: The expenditures of the Government must be brought within its means. That was a fixed fact—quite as redoubtable as any fixed fact which had of late been brought to their notice. His dislike to a reduction of the pay of good public servants (and such they certainly were in the mass) was great; but his dislike to the running up any higher on the people our heavy public debt and taxes was still greater. We are in great distress, public and private. By some kind of hocus pocus, we have been brought to this condition without the intervention of war, famine, or pestilence. Yes, we have been brought to the age of "iron money and black broth," as it was foretold we should be; but not by the Democratic hard-money policy, as a Coon prophet, in 1840, falsely asserted. The journals of this Congress would show what party it was who, in the name of paper money and high wages, go for no money and almost no wages; who, on the question of resumption of payment by the banks of this District, decided, substantially, that resumption here should depend on resumption nowhere. The record shows that an act of Congress had made the resumption of the District banks to depend on the resumption of the banks of Baltimore and Richmond. The Baltimore banks resumed in their own good time, but not in good time for the banks of this District. No, indeed; they must be tinkered so as to make resumption here dependent on resumption at Richmond; which was in principle, he repeated, to make resumption here depend on resumption nowhere. This was but one step in that learned policy, which, by expanding the currency in the ratio of ten nominal dollars to one real dollar, and then contracting it as much, had robbed the people of hundreds of millions of property, and the Government of its revenue, and brought back, with a vengeance, the age of iron-money and black broth. Hear the time expired.

The time having arrived for terminating debate, the committee proceeded to act on the amendments to the first section, which was in these words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, at every session of Congress, and every meeting of the Senate in the recess of Congress, after the [fifth day of December next] first day of November next, each Senator shall be entitled to receive six dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate, and shall also be allowed six dollars for every twenty miles of estimated distance by the most usual road from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting; and in case any member of the Senate shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from such session or meeting, or after his arrival, or shall be unable to attend the Senate, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance. And the President of the Senate pro tempore, when the Vice-President shall be absent, or when his office shall be vacant, shall, during the period of his service, receive an addition to his compensation as a member of the Senate, six dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate: Provided, always, That no Senator shall be allowed for mileage a sum exceeding the rate of six dollars per day from the end of one such session or meeting to the time of taking his seat in another, except he shall have actually travelled the entire distance for which such mileage is allowed: And provided, also, That it shall be the duty of such Senator, when he applies to the President of the Senate for a check, or to have his account certified, to state the number of days he has actually attended, and also the number of days he has been absent, and whether said absence was owing to sickness or otherwise; and unless such member shall certify that he was absent by reason of sickness of himself or family, or by leave of the House, it shall be the duty of the President to give him a check or certificate only for the time he actually attended.

[NOTE.—Parts to be stricken out as recommended by the Select Committee to which this bill was referred, are printed within brackets, and insertions in italics.]

The first question was on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HOLMES,] which is given above; on which tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON and TILLINGHAST were appointed; and they reported 98 in the affirmative, and 64 in the negative.

The amendment to the amendment was, therefore, agreed to; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MERIWETHER hoped the chairman would call the House to order; for there was so much confusion, that he could not hear what the committee was doing. He hoped gentlemen would be called upon to take their seats.

An amendment was moved—but by whom could not be learned—to allow no Senator more than $300 for mileage for any one session.

The amendment was agreed to; 102 voting in the affirmative, and 68 in the negative.

Mr. WISE said that he had an amendment, which he wished to come in as an additional proviso.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, we cannot hear a solitary word. [Roars of laughter.] They are laughing here like hyenas. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WISE repeated that he had an amendment to come in, by way of proviso: Provided that, besides his pay, no Senator shall be allowed—

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, this question is not debatable. [Great laughter and confusion.] I object, Mr. Chairman, to this debate. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WISE. I am not debating it. I am dictating my amendment to the Clerk.

Provided, further, That, besides his pay, no Senator shall be allowed [cries of "roast beef"] any rations [cries of "whether was it beef or not"] in kind, other than beef—[hisses.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Oh, let him go on.

Mr. WISE in continuation—not roasted, [laughter,] and not to exceed a cost of $2. [Loud and long continued roars of laughter.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the amendment; it is as follows: Except "the guard," who are to receive foreign missions after the 4th March next. [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. [Laughter.] I move a further amendment to except the Senate, where there is no member of the guard. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN decided all these amendments to be out of order.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, order must be restored, for we cannot hear a word. [Laughter.] Gentlemen are designing—I charge, sir, that they are designedly making a noise. [Renewed laughter, cries of "order," and the loud hum of voices.] I hope, sir, the Chair will preserve order, or we must stop. [Laughter in all parts of the House.]

The CHAIRMAN then announced the question to be on the amendment recommended by the committee, as follows: "Provided, always, That no Senator shall be allowed for mileage a sum exceeding the rate of six dollars per day, from the end of one such session or meeting to the time of his taking his seat in another, except he shall have actually travelled the entire distance for which such mileage is allowed."

Mr. ARNOLD hoped that amendment would be adopted, for it was a very good one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN then stated that the question was on the amendment recommended by the committee to the proviso, which requires each Senator, when he applies to the President of the Senate for a check, or to have his account certified, to state the number of days he has actually attended; and also the number of days he has been absent, and whether said absence was owing to sickness, or otherwise; and unless such member shall certify that he was absent by reason of sickness of himself or family, or by leave of the House, it shall be the duty of the President to give him a check or certificate only for the time he actually attended.

[The amendment was the words printed in italic.]

Mr. MOORE rose to move an amendment; but, in the confused state of the House, his object was not distinctly heard. It was understood, however, to be a motion to strike out that entire proviso.

Mr. BRIGGS was heard addressing the Chair, above the noise which prevailed, but not a word was distinguishable at the reporter's desk.

Mr. EVERETT was understood to move to strike out the words "of himself or family, or by leave of the House."

Here was a loud cry of "read the section as it now stands amended."

The Clerk read it accordingly; and the strange admixture of anomalous and contradictory matter of which it was composed, elicited roars of laughter; especially that part which required a Senator to certify that, when absent, his absence was by reason of sickness of himself or family, or by leave of the House; thus making his payment for days on which he might be absent, in some cases, dependent on his ability to show that he was absent from the Senate by leave of the House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN put the question on striking out the words, "of himself or family, or by leave of the House," and he decided that he believed the motion to be lost.

A division was called for.

Mr. ROOSEVELT suggested an amendment, to strike out the word "House," and insert "Senate." [Loud cries of "No, no."]

The amendment was negatived; and the amendment proposed by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS was understood to move to strike out all the section, and insert a substitute which he had prepared; and which provided that, from the commencement of the present session of Congress, and henceforth, each Senator should receive $6 per diem, and $4 for every twenty miles travelling, to be by the usual route; and that, on taking the oath at the commencement of the session, they should be sworn to restrain the franking privilege to letters on such Senators' own business, or the extension of liberty by the circulation of documents, &c.; and providing further, that the soldiers of the army and the sailors of the navy shall have $1 a month added to their present pay —[Cries of "Agreed"]—and that all laws or parts of laws conflicting with this act should be thereby repealed.

Mr. WISE asked for tellers on that amendment.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the Chair decide that that is in order?

The CHAIRMAN said the latter part certainly, was not in order.

Mr. WISE. Oh! that's the best part of it.

Mr. ARNOLD said he understood it was not in order to move to strike out all after the enacting clause, until the bill had been gone through.

Mr. WISE said this amendment only proposed to insert a substitute for a section, and not for the entire bill.

Great confusion ensued, in the course of which it was understood that Mr. MOORE moved to strike out "six dollars as the per diem of Senators, and insert $7," to make it correspond with other portions of the bill.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. MOORE was then understood to move to strike out the last proviso. The motion was negatives.

Mr. WISE moved to strike out the word "six" wherever it occurred in that section, and insert "four," thereby proposing to reduce the per diem to $4.

Tellers were called for, and ordered on this amendment, and Messrs. COLES and REYNOLDS were appointed; and they reported 56 in the affirmative, and 82 in the negative. The motion was therefore negatived.

Mr. WELLER moved to strike out the word "six," and insert "five," in the clause of the bill, so as to make the pay of members of Congress five dollars a day.

Pending this motion,

Mr. PENDLETON moved that the committee rise: carried—ayes 88, noes 63.

The committee then rose and reported progress.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS offered a substitute for bill No. 548; which was ordered to be printed.

After ineffectual efforts on the part of various members to get in resolutions and reports,

On motion of Mr. READ,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Post Office Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 7th ult., statements showing in detail the price at present received by the railroad companies for the transportation of the United States mail, the amount paid them, the extent of service, and the price formerly paid for the same service by the old mode of conveyance; which, on motion by Mr. MERRICK, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Governor of Iowa, transmitting joint resolutions adopted by the Council and House of Representatives of that Territory, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the purpose of holding treaties for the purchase of the lands of the Pottawotamie and other tribes of Indians; which, on motion by Mr. LINN, were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, presented the credentials of WILLIAM H. HAYWOOD, Jr. who has been elected by the Legislature of North Carolina a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March next; which were read, and ordered to be placed on file.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the proceedings of a public meeting of citizens of the county of Washington, Pennsylvania, in favor of the establishment of a mail-route from the town of Washington, Pennsylvania, to Steubenville, Ohio: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SIMMONS presented a petition from James Wilson, porter to watch the public grounds at the Capitol, (commonly called "posey watcher,") representing that he is employed seventeen hours per day, and praying Congress to allow him additional compensation: referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CONRAD presented a memorial from Reuben Drake and R. G. Quarles, proposing to Congress to enter into a contract with the Government to reclaim public lands now useless to the Government, for the consideration of a portion of the lands which may be reclaimed: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial, signed by 48 captains of steamboats navigating the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, representing that the toll now exacted for going through the canal at Louisville, on the Ohio river, is ruinous to trade, and such as the commerce and business on the river could not pay; and representing that there are evils in the construction of the canal which unfit it for the business which is now done on that river; and, for the purpose of ridding the commerce of the ruinous exactions imposed on it for passing through this canal, and affording adequate facilities to the increasing commerce, they pray that a canal may be constructed by the Government, on the Indiana side of the river, of sufficient capacity for the passage of larger boats than those which now ascend the river.

Mr. B. proposed to refer the memorial to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WALKER remarked, that the canal spoken of in the memorial was not now adapted to the commerce of the Ohio river, and to the boats which run on the Western rivers; that it was of such capacity as to prevent the construction of a class of boats which were of large dimensions, and of greater speed, and such as were called for by the increasing commerce. If boats of a large class attempted to pass, they were subjected to serious injury by the rocks which were permitted to project from the sides. A boat of which he was some time since on board, in attempting to pass through, was seriously injured. If the locks were considerably enlarged, and the canal cut square down to the bottom, it might be made of sufficient magnitude for all the boats which run there. There, however, seemed no disposition on the part of the company to do this, and to prevent the collection of these onereus tolls. If those difficulties were continued, he would go in for a sufficient grant of the public land in Indiana to that State, on the condition that she will construct a canal adequate for the accommodation of the commerce on those rivers.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he was much gratified to hear of the introduction of the petition by the Senator from Missouri. There was no subject, in connexion with the commerce on the Western waters, of more interest than that of the removal of the obstructions in the falls of the Ohio river. He then made some remarks on the great interest which the stockholders of that canal received on their investment, which was about 18 per cent. Commerce, he said, was obstructed to a very great extent; the large class of boats were excluded entirely from the upper river, owing to the unevenness of this canal. It was almost impossible for a single canal to answer the purposes of the increasing ascending and descending commerce on that river; therefore a canal on the other side of the river was demanded. He could not hope that anything would be done at the present session of Congress, in regard to the subject; but he did hope that the Western Senators and Western members would urge this matter until the navigation of the Ohio should be relieved from this obstruction, and commerce from the onerous burden which was imposed upon it by the exactions of the canal company. He believed that when the matter was examined by the committee, it would be found that it was practicable to construct to a canal on the Indiana side of the Ohio, to remove the obstructions to the commerce there.

Mr. TAPPAN did not agree with the other Senators as to their opinions of the best mode of removing the obstacles complained of. It was his opinion that a canal ought not to be made. The obstruction in that river, at the falls, was a ridge of soft limestone running across the navigation of the river. The current would be as smooth above as below, if the Government of the United States would (as it ought to do) improve the navigation at this point, by removing a considerable portion of the ridge, which would do away with the necessity of a canal on the Indiana side. When the matter came up, he would urge an improvement of the navigation at that point.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from the Legislature of Missouri, on the subject of improvement of the great swamps in the southeast portion of Missouri, and the northeast portion of Arkansas; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, presented a memorial of a committee appointed by citizens of St. Louis, asking Congress to adopt measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, presented a petition of citizens of Franklin county, Missouri, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Port William to Little Piney, in Pulaski county, Missouri: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HUNTINGTON presented a petition from Elizabeth Raymond, the widow of John Raymond, an officer of the army of the Revolution, for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the petition of Samuel Thomas for a pension, and the petition of Sarah Williamson for a pension under the act of July 7, 1838, moved that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the War Department, which was competent to grant the prayers of the petitioners: agreed to.

Mr. B. also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they be indefinitely postponed, the bills from the House for the relief of Prudence Crouch, and for the relief of David Munn. The reports accompanying were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, made an adverse report (which was ordered to be printed) on the petition of William Morrow, praying to be indemnified for losses sustained by him in consequence of the violation of his contract for the performance of certain work at the Washington arsenal.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, made an adverse report (which was ordered to be printed) on the petition of Charles Debault Delassus, for remuneration for money forcibly taken from him for the public service at the capture of Baton Rouge.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame De Lusser and her legal representatives.

On motion by Mr. T., the previous orders were postponed, and the bill was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole; and, there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, the bill from the House for the relief of James Mount; and,

On motion by Mr. W., the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the above bill was taken up as in committee of the whole, and indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WILCOX, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House for the payment of certain companies of Michigan militia.

On motion by Mr. PORTER, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the above bill was taken up, as in committee of the whole, and, after a few remarks by Mr. KING, who contended that if the militia were entitled to pay, they could receive it under existing laws; and by Mr. PORTER, showing the reason why they could not receive pay without a special law; the bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading; and accordingly was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill for the relief of Joseph ——— of Missouri—[name not heard.]

Mr. LINN made a proposition, directing the Secretary of the Senate to place all the private bills on a separate calendar, with a view to expedite action upon them; but, after a few remarks by Mr. KING, showing that, instead of expediting action, it would retard the business of the Senate, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. GRAHAM submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate, as early as practicable, what has been done by that department under the act of last session of Congress, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at or near Ocracoke, in North Carolina," approved August 29, 1842; especially whether a site for said hospital has been purchased or contracted for, and whether any reappropriation of money is necessary to complete it.

The resolution submitted by Mr. LINN on yesterday, fixing 11 o'clock, a. m., for the daily hour of meeting of the Senate hereafter, was taken up and rejected—ayes 18, noes 19.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of a number of citizens of Missouri, praying that the settlers on the old military reserve, near Fort Leavenworth, may be allowed the right of preemption to the same, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, (which was agreed to by the Senate,) directing a copy of the report to be transmitted to the Secretary of War.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the credentials of SILAS WRIGHT, JR., who has been elected by the Legislature of New York a Senator from that State for six years, from and after the 4th day of March next; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the previous orders of the day were postponed; and the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill from the House for the relief of Charles J. Jenkins and William Williams, assignees of Joseph McKinne.

Mr. BERRIEN explained the bill; and, after a few remarks by Mr. EVANS in opposition to its passage, and indicating a wish to make an amendment, it was postponed till to-morrow.

RETRENCHMENT, ECONOMY, AND GOVERNMENT RESOURCES.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, the unfinished business of yesterday was taken up; being the consideration of the following resolutions introduced by Mr. MCDUFFIE, on Tuesday, the 7th instant, viz:

Resolved, That it is the solemn and urgent duty of the present Congress to adopt, without delay, efficient measures to revive the crippled and decaying commerce, replenish the impoverished exchequer, and arrest the alarming accumulation of the public debt of the United States.

Resolved, That a modification of the existing tariff on foreign imports, such as will render it strictly and in good faith a mere revenue measure, is indispensable to the accomplishment of those objects; and that the recent measures of the British Parliament, partially adopting the principles of free trade, the public indications of a disposition on the part of the present ministry to extend those principles still further, and the probability of the speedy organization of an extensive system of smuggling on the long line of our frontier, furnish pressing motives to Congress for acting on the subject during its present session.

Resolved, That a rigid system of retrenchment, economy, and accountability, such as will bring the annual expenditures within the annual income of the Government, is not less indispensable; and that, while this is rendered necessary by the deplorable state of the public finances, it is rendered just, and not injurious to the public service, by the great reduction of the currency, and consequent appreciation of the value of money.

To which Mr. EVANS had moved to append the following additional resolutions:

Resolved, That, among the causes which have contributed most efficiently to the depression of the foreign and domestic commerce of the country, and to the consequent impoverishment of the national treasury, and which have thus rendered a resort to loans inevitable, is the want of a currency of uniform value in all parts of the United States, commanding the confidence of the people; and no measure designed to revive commerce, replenish the treasury, and avert the further accumulation of public debt, will be complete or adequate to the accomplishment of these objects, which fail to supply their wants.

Resolved, That another of the prominent causes of the present prostrated condition of the business of the country, and of the public finances, and which has largely impaired American character and credit, which has exposed republican institutions to reproach and obloquy, is the failure of so many States of the Union to provide for the regular payment of the interest on their public debts; and especially the favor and countenance which have been given, to some extent, in some portions of the country, to the alarming and destructive doctrine, that these debts are not binding upon the people of the States which have created them, but may be annulled and repudiated at their discretion.

Resolved, That, while this Congress does not intend to adopt any measures for the payment by the United States of the debts of the individual States, it nevertheless deems it proper, in view of the disastrous consequences to the national character and credit, and to the institutions of republican government, of the failure of the States to fulfil their obligations, and of the principle which has been asserted—that these obligations are not binding on them,—to declare, that the debts of the States, created by the legislative authority thereof, respectively, are obligatory and binding upon said States, and cannot be by them annulled or repudiated; and that it is the solemn and urgent duty of the people of said States to resort to the most efficient means in their power for the preservation of their faith, and the fulfilment of their obligations.

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress, by every constitutional and proper means in its power—by the adoption of measures to restore and preserve a currency of uniform value throughout the United States; by the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, and the regulation and administration of the public finances, in such way as shall be least burdensome to the people, and most conducive to the revival of trade and commerce; as shall secure the wages of labor from fluctuation; as shall give security and steadiness to the industry of the country,—to render every practicable aid and encouragement to the people of the several States in their efforts to meet their engagements, and to discharge the obligations into which they have entered.

Which Mr. DAYTON had moved to amend, by striking out the third of Mr. EVANS's resolutions, and inserting the following in its stead:

Resolved, That the distrust and obloquy cast upon the Federal Government by reason of the failure of certain States to make prompt payment of their debts, is an unjust and unfounded imputation upon its credit and good faith; that, while this Government deplores the misguided policy of those States which have embarrassed themselves, it disclaims all liability, legally or morally, for such delinquency; while, in vindication of its own unblemished faith and honor, it appeals with confidence to its past history.

Mr. DAYTON being entitled to the floor on the pending question, in relation to the adoption of his proposed amendment, addressed the Senate for upwards of an hour.

He stated that the offer which he made yesterday, to waive his claim to the floor, having failed to accomplish the object of their proceeding to the vote; and the question now pending being on his amendment, he felt it due to himself to submit a few brief remarks, in explanation of the reasons which induced him to think that amendment important and necessary. No Senator could deprecate more than he would a useless loss of the public time, at this late period of the session, in a mere discussion of abstract theories. But, if gentlemen on the other side chose to introduce resolutions of that character, tending to no practical result, the responsibility of wasting the public time could not be laid at the doors of his friends or himself, should they feel themselves placed in such a position as to demand either enlargement, modification, or discussion. The resolutions offered by the Senator from South Carolina reach to, and propose, no measure of public relief for the distress which they depict.

He (Mr. D.) had listened with great pleasure to the able speech which was delivered in support of those resolutions, in the hope that it would conclude with some definite and practical proposition for the relief of the country; more particularly as the Senator appealed, in the course of his remarks, to all parties to unite in effecting the object he had in view. But in this he was disappointed; for nothing was urged but the resolutions themselves; and they, and all that was said in their support, ended with a mere promulgation of abstract political principles. He could not discover, from them and the Senator's remarks, more than three main principles: in relation to the currency, to be let alone to work out its own salvation; to finance, to be improved by pulling down the tariff law; and to commerce, by reciprocating the action of Great Britain in favor of an approach to free trade.

On each of these points Mr. D. expatiated considerably at length, and then adverted to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Maine, as an addition to the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina. These additional resolutions he considered equally obnoxious to the charge of reaching to no practical result. Fully as he accorded with the general principles which they avowed, he considered them, as well as the original resolutions, unnecessary; because no definite action would grow out of them for the good of the country. As, however, they were before the Senate, he did not wish to let them pass to a vote without such modification as he thought essential; and, as he had strong objection to the wording of the third resolution of the amendment, he had proposed a substitute for that resolution, which he read.

In explaining his object in thus vindicating the credit and character of the United States, he stated his regret that hitherto every officer in the Government, from the highest to the lowest, had taken a course calculated to show to the world that they felt the character and credit of the country to be depressed, instead of boldly repelling the unfounded assertions of others that they were so. He insisted on it, that the credit and good faith of the United States never had been impaired; that they had been preserved without a blot or blemish since the foundation of the Government; and that, in this respect, we stood proudly pre-eminent above the nations of Europe, who now calumniated us in the foreign money markets.

In proof of all this, he entered into a long and minute history of the iniquities practised by Great Britain, in laying the foundation of her national debt, and enlarging it from time to time, till it had reached the enormous sum of upwards of thirty-five hundred millions of dollars—in comparison with which, our national debt shrank into a mere nothing, or at least a sum so small as to be scarcely capable of paying half a year's interest. He enumerated the debts due by France, Holland, Naples, Russia, &c., to show how deeply they were all involved; and contrasted their condition with that of this country—possessing unexampled resources, and an inheritance stretching from sea to sea, through a wide extent of country unequalled for fertility and natural advantages. Having evidenced all these things, as a vindication of the unimpaired good faith and credit of the United States, he commented with severity upon those portions of the President's message which he considered could have no better tendency than to give countenance to the calumnies uttered in foreign money markets against our credit. He particularly alluded to the unnecessary and imprudent exposure of the fact that an accredited agent, sent to Europe to negotiate the loan, had been sent back repulsed.

Speaking of the assumption of the State debts, he deprecated any proposition of that nature as unwise and impolitic, without giving any opinion as to the power of the Government in that particular. The question of the power of the Government to interfere he had not sufficiently examined into, to enable him to form an opinion; but he had fully made up his mind as to the imprudence of any such measure.

Mr. D. concluded by urging the adoption of his substitute for the third resolution of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MERRICK next obtained the floor, and insisted on his motion (of which he had given notice yesterday) to lay the whole subject on the table. He again urged the impropriety of wasting the short time which yet remained of the session, so necessary to be applied to the legislative business remaining unfinished, upon mere abstract questions. He pointed out that, in his opinion, gentlemen were mistaken who supposed that his motion would carry with it the resolutions of the Senator from Virginia. That Senator had only given notice of his intention to offer them: they were not before the Senate, and could not be, as long as an amendment to an amendment of an original proposition was pending. No fitter time could, therefore, be chosen for pressing his motion than at present.

Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. RIVES inquired of the Chair whether, if the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey were either adopted or rejected, would he not have a right to move his amendment as a substitute for the resolutions of the Senator from Maine?

The CHAIR explained that a motion to strike out a larger portion of the resolutions, containing the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, with a view of inserting others in their place, would be in order.

Mr. RIVES contended that his resolutions were in that case before the Senate, and would be affected by the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. MERRICK said they would not be involved in the motion a whit more than any other amendments which gentlemen might intend to offer.

Mr. CRITTENDEN asked if it was in order for gentlemen to catechise the Chair as to the course to be pursued with regard to something intended to be done?

The question was then called for on Mr. MERRICK's motion to lay the whole on the table; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—23.

Mr. RIVES then submitted his resolutions (which will be found in the proceedings of February 16) as a substantive proposition. They lie over one day, under the rule.

Mr. LINN submitted a resolution, that the daily hour of meeting after Saturday next shall be at 11 o'clock, a. m., for the remainder of the session, instead of 12.

The resolution lies over till to-morrow.

On motion by Mr. WHITE, the Senate went into executive session; and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1843.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of Solomon Thayer and 62 other citizens of Lubec, Maine, praying Congress for such an alteration of our commercial relations with foreign Governments as shall give to the navigation of the United States terms of just reciprocity; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Also, the petition of M. G. Buck and 76 other citizens of Bucksport, Maine, praying Congress to impose an additional duty on sawed lumber, firewood, fish, &c., from the British provinces; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WARD presented a petition of 400 merchants and workingmen of New York and Brooklyn, in favor of Gilbert's floating dry-dock: referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. OLIVER presented the petition of Nathan Beard, asking to be paid for $5,606 of continental currency, received for services rendered during the revolutionary war in 1777 and 1778—the said continental currency being of no value.

Mr. REYNOLDS presented the memorial and resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, stating the following facts: That certain citizens of Macon county and the vicinity, reside in the interior of the State, and are located 80 miles from the navigation of the Illinois river, and 130 from that of the Wabash. These citizens reside on and near the cross railroad route, extending from the Illinois river, at Naples, by Springfield, the seat of Government of the State, to the eastern border of the State, to meet the Indiana canal and railroad at Covington, which communicates to Lake Erie, through Indiana and Ohio. The memorial states further, that the abovenamed communication in Indiana and Ohio is completed for 235 miles, and will be finished in Indiana during this year from Lafayette to Covington, which is in the direction of the cross railroad route in Illinois. This communication completed, a direct inland channel for the commerce of the most fertile region of country in the Union would be established from the navigable waters of the Mississippi to Lake Erie, and by Buffalo to the cities of New York and Boston. This communication would shorten the distance from the Mississippi to Lake Erie several thousand miles less than the route by Chicago, Mackinack, and Detroit.

The memorial further shows that the country adjacent to this northern cross railroad is the most fertile in Illinois, and the farmers already raise a great surplus of products in it; but the location is so far from the means of transporting this surplus to market, that the crops are rotting on the hands of the farmers. It is also stated, that some considerable portion of the public lands are yet unsold on this route. It is also stated that this improvement is national, extending from the Mississippi to Boston; and that similar public works in the States of Indiana and Ohio have received donations in land from the General Government, to aid the States in such improvements. The memorial goes further, and says, that the price of the public lands will be enhanced in value more than double by the construction of this road in Illinois; and, in consideration of these facts, the resolutions of the Legislature pray that every alternate section of the public land along the route in Illinois, be granted to the State, to aid in the completion of this public improvement. The reserved land will be enhanced more in value by the donation, than the whole is at present. The memorial and resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands in the House of Representatives; and they are so just and reasonable, that no doubt a favorable action will be had on them, if the lateness of the session does not prevent it, as there is not much more than two weeks of the session yet unexpired.

On motion of Mr. PENDLETON, a memorial some time since presented by him, in relation to steamboat explosions, was ordered to be printed.

CLERKS EMPLOYED BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. G. DAVIS rose, and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, report to this House the number, classes, and compensation of persons employed in their several departments, respectively, on the 1st day of January, 1839, and on the 1st day of January, 1843; distinguishing, by bureaus, where they exist in the department.

Mr. FILLMORE said it appeared to him that a useless expense would be incurred by the adoption of that resolution; and it was especially unnecessary, as all the information which it would call for was already published in public documents.

Mr. G. DAVIS said if it was in the public documents, it would take so much less time to collect it in the shape which he proposed.

Mr. FILLMORE said, in the present state of the national treasury, they should save all the expense they possibly could.

Mr. BOWNE asked if that debate was in order.

The SPEAKER was understood to reply in the negative.

Mr. BOWNE then objected to it, and to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. G. DAVIS moved a suspension of the rules, for the reception of his resolution.

The motion to suspend was agreed to, and the resolution was adopted.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. READ said for two months he had been appealing to the House to place on the journal a resolution which he had offered on a very important subject. It was a subject of the deepest importance, and one on which the House ought to have acted at the commencement of the session—he alluded to a modification of the tariff. He admitted that he did not now, at this late period of the session, expect that the House would act on that subject; but he desired that his proposition should go on the journal. [Objections were made in various parts of the hall.] He continued: if it were objected to, he would object to everything out of order to the end of the session. [Laughter.] For two months he had been offering this resolution, but without effect.

Mr. STANLY objected to the continuation of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. READ said he was not arguing the question

Mr. STANLY insisted that the gentleman was arguing it.

[Cries of "Read the resolution."]

The Clerk read it accordingly, as follows:

Whereas the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," passed 30th August, 1842, having been passed in the hurry and confusion of the last day of a session, and therefore greatly defective, not only in its details, but in some of its principles; imposing prohibitory duties on a great variety of articles, thereby so far defeating itself, both in regard to revenue and protection—the latter, by administering a powerful stimulant to the smuggling trade; therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill, supplementary to the said act of the 30th August last, based upon the following principles, viz:

1. To provide an adequate revenue for the economical administration of the Government, and no more—say from twenty to twenty-three millions.

2. Articles classed as "necessaries of life," and entering into general consumption, of a description not grown or produced in the United States, to be admitted free of duty.

3. Articles imported, coming in competition with those grown or produced in the United States, to be taxed so as to give ample protection to our farmers, planters, manufacturers, and mechanics.

4. The measure of such protection to be, in all cases, so much duty as will make the cost of the foreign article in our markets equal to the cost of production in the United States, and no more: thus bringing the foreign and American manufacturer into our markets on a footing of perfect equality, increasing the supply in proportion to the demand, and thereby reducing the price to the consumer.

5. If it should be found necessary to impose higher duties for revenue than are required by the said measure of protection, in such case luxuries to pay a higher duty than necessaries.

6. No drawback to be allowed on foreign sugars refined in the United States, nor on spirits distilled from foreign molasses.

7. No drawback to be allowed in any case, except on goods imported and specially entered for exportation, and actually exported within ninety days from the time of importation.

8. All duties to be paid in cash at the time of importation.

9. All duties to be levied on the true value of the goods in the principal ports of the United States; the valuation to be made, in the first instance, by the collector of the port; and, if the importer shall appeal, the value to be finally ascertained by a board of commissioners, to be appointed for that purpose.

Mr. BRONSON interrupted the reading of the resolutions, and objected to their reception.

Mr. READ moved a suspension of the rules, an on this he called for the yeas and nays.

The House did not order the yeas and nays.

Mr. READ made some remarks on the course he was desirous to pursue; but his observations were not heard at the reporter's desk.

The motion to suspend the rules was then negatived.

RETRENCHMENT.

On the motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, the Select Committee on Retrenchment, appointed on the 3d day of February last, was authorized to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses on oath.

THE WAREHOUSING SYSTEM.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY submitted a resolution to make bill No. 730 (being a bill making provision for the warehousing of imported goods) the special order for Tuesday, the 21st instant.

Mr. HOPKINS objected, and said he hoped they would have no more special orders during this session.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY moved a suspension of the rules; but it was not agreed to.

BILL No. 548.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired what the order of the day was.

The SPEAKER replied, House bill No. 548. [Laughter.]

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to, and Mr. UNDERWOOD took the chair.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the committee proof this Congress—at the very last hour of the third session of Congress, to proclaim to this country that he had no opinion on the ways and means!

Mr. FILLMORE begged permission to explain.

Mr. WISE said he should like to have an explanation.

Mr. FILLMORE explained that he meant he had formed no opinion independent of executive communications.

Mr. WISE asked the gentleman if he believed the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury was correct.

Mr. FILLMORE replied that he had no means of showing its incorrectness, and he had no reason to believe that the Secretary was a dishonest man.

Mr. WISE inquired if the gentleman from New York believed in the data of the Secretary?

Mr. BOTTS rose to a question of order. The gentleman from Virginia had no right to poll the members of the Committee of Ways and Means in this way.

Mr. FILLMORE rose to explain.

Mr. WISE begged the reporters to take note of the gentleman's explanation. And what was it? It was this: "I have no opinion independent of the information of the Secretary of the Treasury." What is your opinion about the information of the Secretary of the Treasury? "I have no means of showing that it is incorrect." Well, now, what was the gentleman's opinion at last? Nothing at all. The gentleman from New York said, the other day, that if the data of the Secretary were correct, why then his calculations were correct.

He (Mr. W.) asked if the Secretary's data were correct; and the reply was, "I have no means of knowing whether they are correct or incorrect." And this came from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who confessed that, independent of the Secretary of the Treasury, he had got no opinion at all. Did they believe that he had got no opinion? The gentleman did not say he had got no opinion; but though he had got no specific opinion, he (Mr. W.) believed he had a general conclusion as to the correction of those data. Now, he asked for the motive for the concealment of those opinions. He asked why there was not a report from that committee?

Mr. FILLMORE asked the gentleman from Virginia if he believed the report made by the Secretary of the Treasury, as he was nearer the Executive than he (Mr. F.) could be; or whether the gentleman from Virginia had any means of knowing that it was false.

Mr. WISE. This is not a question of falsehood. [Laughter.] He begged gentlemen to wait for an answer before they laughed. He told the gentleman from New York that he differed wholly from the Secretary of the Treasury. Had they got their answer? [Laughter.] Now, would the gentleman answer him a question? Did the gentleman from New York believe in the correctness of the Secretary's report? [Cries of "That's fair."] Now, let gentlemen laugh. He (Mr. W.) differed from the Secretary of the Treasury, and he believed his data would be found to be a sandy foundation, and that the superstructure based upon it must fall necessarily.

The gentleman pursued these remarks in this strain some time, and expressed his dread of an extra session, and his desire to avoid its necessity.

Mr. FILLMORE replied, and Mr. WISE rejoined.

Mr. FILLMORE said he was glad to hear this declaration from the gentleman. If that gentleman, standing upon this floor, and speaking the sentiments of this Administration, declared that an extra session ought not to be called, and that there were no reasons for it, he (Mr. F.) was truly glad to hear it. As to whether the Committee of Ways and Means had discharged their duty or not, he had but little to say. The present was the short session; and, during its continuance, the Committee of Ways and Means had to perform the duty of examining a double set of appropriation bills—for the half calendar year, and for the fiscal year. They had also before them a proposition to bring back into the treasury money which was said to have been hitherto squandered; also, the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury that means should be provided for carrying the department through the year to the 1st of January next; and also the exchequer project, which had occupied much of their time. These were the duties which they had to perform during this short session. Whether the committee had been diligent or not, it was for the House to say. With what ability the duties had been performed, it certainly did not become him to say. But if it was a fact (as conceded by the President in the message just read) that it was the duty of the Executive to inform the House as to the state of the finances of the country, he put it to the gentleman to point out a single fact which indicated that the Committee of Ways and Means had abandoned all measures to carry the Government through the year. The committee took up the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which that officer stated that there would be enough means to carry on the Government through the half calendar year, and through the fiscal year to June, 1844, and then leave a million and a half in the treasury. When doubt began to be expressed as to the accuracy of the Secretary's calculations, the committee, unconnected as they were by any near relations to the Administration, caused inquiries to be made of the Secretary, with a view of affording him an opportunity to revise his estimates. Therefore it was that he addressed a letter to the Secretary, calling on him for the amount which he estimated would be received and paid out during the year.

He would say to the House, that it was in the power of the Executive, if he saw fit, to exhaust the treasury, for the purpose of calling an extra session of Congress. Such a thing might be done; if it was done, the Executive would be responsible for the extra session.

It was known that large appropriations would be made by this Congress, to lie over until next year. Now, it was only necessary for the President, in the exercise of his power to control the expenditures of these appropriations, to exhaust the treasury, by paying them over before they were absolutely needed; and thus create the very necessity (an extra session) which the gentleman deplored. If there should be no more expended during the year than what was appropriated by Congress for that period, he should say that, in his opinion, the ways and means of the treasury would be sufficient. He only asked that the Government might be administered as it had been in years past. In such an event, he did believe that the means of the treasury would prove sufficient. He believed he had said all that was necessary on this head.

As to the instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means, moved by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] all he had to say was, that he deemed them unnecessary. They implied a censure upon the committee; and he knew not what duty they had omitted which called for censure upon them. The committee had never neglected to consider carefully anything that was recommended by the Executive.

Mr. WISE then rose and withdrew his motion to reconsider the printing of the message; after which,

The House adjourned.

Mr. EVANS presented a memorial from citizens of the State of Maine, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, presented a memorial from Lubec, Maine, praying such legislation on the part of Congress as will produce greater reciprocity in our commercial regulations with foreign powers: ordered to lie on the table.

On motion by Mr. WOODBURY, leave was granted to Molly Luther, Mary Chase, Daniel Peck, and George Johnson, to withdraw their petitions and papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from Ruth Milligan, praying that the sum of $220 continental notes, paid to her husband, since deceased, for his services during the revolutionary war, may be made good to her or her children, by such general and equitable law as may be finally passed on the subject. Mr. L. remarked that, if any committee should be hereafter raised to take into consideration the subject of paying the debts of the States, he would move the reference of this petition to that committee. It struck him, however, that there would be more propriety in paying off the old revolutionary debt, before the idea of assuming the debts of the States was entertained. For the present, he moved that the petition be laid on the table. Agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the amendments of the House to the Senate bill for the relief of William Du Buys, postmaster at New Orleans, reported the bill back, with a recommendation that the Senate concur in the amendments.

The question was put, and the Senate concurred.

Mr. CHOATE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented joint resolutions, adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to vote for the abolishment of the Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York, and for the adoption of such a plan of military instructions as will be impartial in its operations, and consistent with the spirit and genius of our liberal institutions; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, made a report, (which was ordered to be printed,) adverse to the passage of the House bill for the relief of Major Thomas Harrison.

On motion by Mr. BATES, leave was granted to Thomas Flanagan to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate, instructing that committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the system of revenue cutters, and to employ a part of the navy of the United States in that service, made a report, (which was ordered to be printed,) accompanied by a resolution, declaring that it was inexpedient to adopt the recommendations of the resolution.

Mr. H., from the same committee, to which had been referred House bill entitled "An act to reduce the number and compensation of the officers and others employed in the port of New York," reported it back, with an amendment to strike out the preamble.

Mr. WOODBURY submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate of the net amount of revenue received from the customs in the month of January, 1843, according to the current returns made to the Treasury Department.

Mr. LINN presented a petition from Markham Tristoe, late postmaster at Warren, Benton county, Missouri, praying that the amount of a judgment obtained against him in the circuit court of the United States from the Missouri district may be refunded to him: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, presented a petition from Abraham Wilcox, representing that he is the father of twenty-two children, praying aid of the Government to raise a company to go to the Oregon Territory, and for grants of land, &c.; which was read, and laid on the table.

The resolution of the Committee on Commerce, to discharge that committee from the further consideration of the resolution of the Senate of the 27th of December last, directing it to inquire into the state of our tonnage, freights, and commerce, and to report whether they were prosperous under our existing regulations with foreign powers, &c., and to refer the same to the Secretary of State, and directing him to make the inquiries touching the matter, and to report thereon at the next session of Congress, was taken up; and, after a few remarks by Messrs. HUNTINGTON and WOODBURY, was adopted.

The following resolution introduced by Mr. BENTON on yesterday, was taken up for consideration; and, after a few remarks by Mr. ARCHER, not in opposition to its adoption, but expressing the belief that the call was unlike any ever made, it was agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the commission, or letter of instruction, which may have been given to Daniel Webster, Esq., Secretary of State, to treat with Lord Ashburton, late special minister from Great Britain to the United States.

The engrossed joint resolution directing the transfer of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, to the State of Maryland, and to the cities of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, on certain conditions, came up for a third reading.

Mr. KING remarked that one of the conditions in the bill on which the stock was surrendered, was, that the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal shall be completed to Cumberland. He inquired of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] whether he considered that the terms of the bill were such as authorized the Government to reclaim the stock in case the terms of the bill were not complied with.

Mr. MERRICK replied that, if the conditions were not complied with, the whole of the stock would revert to the Government.

The resolution was then read the third time, and passed.

The joint resolution for the distribution of certain copies of the Census Returns and Compendium of the Sixth Census, was read the third time and passed.

The bill relating to the appointment of Assistant Postmasters General, vesting the power to appoint them in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, was read a third time, and passed.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BERRIEN said that he had given notice to the Senate on yesterday, that he would on to-day move to fix a day for the consideration of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law. He was disposed to give notice that he would on Monday next ask the Senate to take that bill up for consideration. He said that it was desirable that the information obtained from the Secretary of State, as to the operations of the law, and the report of the committee on the subject, should be as widely disseminated as possible before they were called upon to act finally upon the bill; and it was desirable to give further time to Senators to consider the report of the Judiciary Committee, and the amendments recommended by it. He supposed that all that was desired by delay could be accomplished by Monday next.

Mr. YOUNG preferred that the bill should be then taken up, and made the special order for Monday next; but, on being informed that such course would place the bill behind other special orders, he acquiesced in the suggestion of Mr. BERRIEN.

RETRENCHMENT, ECONOMY, AND GOVERNMENT RESOURCES.

The resolutions introduced on Tuesday last by Mr. McDUFFIE, on the propriety of adopting measures to revive commerce, replenish the impoverished exchequer, and to arrest the accumulation of public debt, by reducing the tariff of the last session to a revenue standard, and by practising a rigid system of retrenchment, economy, and accountability, came up for consideration.

Mr. EVANS (in reply to Mr. McDUFFIE's remarks of yesterday) addressed the Senate for upwards of two hours and a half, discussing at large the various topics involved in the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, and the additional resolutions which he had himself submitted.

At the outset, he remarked, it was with very great reluctance that he rose to occupy any portion of the time of the Senate at this late period of the session, when there were so many important and pressing matters demanding its attention, in the discussion of these resolutions—resolutions which he feared were to end in discussion alone. Nevertheless, as they were deemed of very great importance, (as they certainly were,) and had been discussed with ability by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] who always evidenced an ability in whatever he undertook to discuss, he felt it to be his duty as briefly as possible to submit such remarks as the hasty consideration of the subject would enable him to make. The resolutions of the honorable Senator were chiefly directed to the condition of the treasury—to the finances and commerce of the country; and a very large portion of the speech with which the Senator had favored the Senate was directed to the condition of the business of the country, which he (Mr. E.) admitted were inseparably connected. He agreed with the Senator fully and thoroughly, that the commerce of the country was crippled to a very great extent, and that business was deeply embarrassed. He would not differ from the honorable Senator as to the terms of the resolution, which proposed a system of economy and retrenchment, and of limiting the expenses of Government to the income which may be derived by the treasury from all sources. He would agree with the Senator, that the commerce of the country was greatly embarrassed and crippled; but he differed from him radically as to the causes which had occasioned it, and as to the efficacy of the measures which he proposed to revive it.

Mr. E. then proceeded to a minute investigation of the measures which he conceived had led to the derangements of the currency, to which he mainly attributed the distresses of the country. He vindicated the course which he and the friends with whom he had acted took in defence of the State banks, after they had been stimulated by the Government and broken down, and when the Administration turned round on them, and endeavored to destroy them.

Having disposed of this branch of the subject, he adverted to the position assumed in the Senator's resolutions—that the tariff law was the cause of the condition of the country, and that a revision of that law would resuscitate commerce. He contended that the commerce of the country was two-fold—foreign and domestic; and that the one was dependent on the other; so that, if domestic commerce languished and fell into decay, so must foreign commerce. It was, therefore, more reasonable to trace the crippled state of foreign commerce to causes which had operated on domestic commerce, than to what the Senator contends was for the protection and benefit of the home manufacturing interests identified with domestic commerce. In tracing out their causes, he (Mr. E.) had satisfied himself that they had their origin in the want of a sound currency of uniform value in every part of the Union. This, he contended, was the great source of the evils under which the country labored.

In speaking of the condition of the treasury, and its resources, he assumed that the dutiable imports of the year 1843 would be forty-two millions—yielding a revenue from customs of thirteen or fourteen millions of dollars. He estimated that the actual expenditures of the Government, independent of the interest on debt, would not exceed twenty-two millions of dollars for the year and a half ending 30th June, 1844. He combated the idea that the debt could, by any possibility, reach to what had been assumed by some—thirty or forty millions before the end of the year. It did not at present exceed twenty-five millions; and could not be increased one dollar without a law of Congress to that effect; of which there was no possible chance now, at this late period of the session. The reductions and retrenchments effected by Congress in the appropriation bills rendered it certain that the Government could get along very well, and without the slightest embarrassment, by being allowed to re-issue treasury notes already authorized. Those bearing interest were already at a premium, and would naturally stay out without any effort; and it would be only necessary to allow the treasury notes falling due this year to bear interest, to keep them out too, and prevent them from embarrassing the treasury.

Mr. E. attributed to the passage of the tariff law of last session the revival of the credit of the Government, and the high appreciation of the Government stocks in the money market.

Speaking of his resolutions, to the effect that it is the duty of the several States to make provision for meeting their engagements, and sustaining their credit, he contended that the General Government had a right to make that declaration, without incurring the censure of the States, inasmuch as the depreciation of their credit reacted on the credit of the United States; and besides, as a creditor of some of those States, at least to the amount of six or seven millions, the United States was entitled to the rights of a creditor, in regard to expressing its opinions.

He also maintained that the General Government, being the Government of the same people who owned the States themselves, was bound to render those States, in their necessity, whatever assistance it was in its power to afford. How that was to be done, was a matter of consideration, and could not, at this late period of the session, become a proper subject of discussion.

Mr. E. concluded by proposing the following amendment to the resolution of Mr. McDUFFIE: for which see proceedings of the 15th Feb.

Mr. DAYTON moved to strike out the last three resolutions of the amendment, with a view to insert the following:

Resolved, That the distrust and obloquy cast upon the Federal Government by reason of the failure of certain States to make prompt payment of their debts, is an unjust and unfounded imputation upon its credit and good faith; that, while this Government deplores the misguided policy of those States which have embarrassed themselves, it disclaims all liability, legally or morally, for such delinquency; while, in vindication of its own unblemished faith and honor, it appeals with confidence to its past history.

Mr. D. then remarked that he had no disposition to embark in the general discussion which had arisen on these resolutions; but, having submitted this amendment to one of the resolutions, he would feel gratified if the Senate would afford him a few moments in which to express his views on the subject of his amendment. It was very desirable to him that the matter should be postponed till to-morrow, pledging himself to occupy the Senate but a few minutes at that time.

Mr. RIVES remarked that he wished to submit a paper which he had prepared, expressing his own views on the subject-matter brought into the discussion on these resolutions. It was not then in order to submit this paper as an amendment to the resolutions pending; but, with the leave of the Senate, he would present it with the view—if the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] was rejected—of submitting it as a substitute for the last three resolutions of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. EVANS] The paper was read.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped that both of the amendments proposed, and the paper submitted by the honorable Senator from Virginia, would be received and printed. They were received, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK remarked that he was exceedingly sorry to find that, when there were just about two weeks of the session left, a general discussion was likely to be opened up on a proposition out of which no practical good could grow. If the discussion was permitted to progress, the whole session would be consumed in unprofitable debate. He therefore rose for the simple purpose of giving notice to the Senate that on to-morrow, as soon after the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] as he could get the floor, he would move to lay the whole of the propositions on the table; and he trusted that all those Senators who were anxious to proceed with the practical business of the session would be in their places, and sustain, by their votes, the proposition he intended to make.

Mr. ALLEN did not believe that the discussion which was suggested on the introduction of the resolutions of the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] was unprofitable or unwise; and if he had even supposed that such was the case with reference to those resolutions, he should have changed his opinion after the introduction of the several propositions now laid before that body. The proposition submitted as an amendment to the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, intended to present to the Senate the question of the assumption of the debts of the States, having come before them on the responsibility of a Senator, it would be unbecoming in the Senate, in the present emergency, not to meet the question fully, fairly, and openly. He then said he rose for the purpose of expressing the hope that, under no circumstances, would the Senate agree to the motion which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] intimated his intention to submit. The language of the resolutions of the Senator from Virginia admonished them of the consequences which would be fairly deduced if the Senate adopted this side way of disposing of the question; that delusive hopes would be entertained that this Government would endorse the faltering credit of the States, by directly or indirectly assuming their debts. Such (said he) would be the effect of the failure on the part of the Senate to express its opinion on the subject. The negative act of a failure to express an opinion against the assumption, would be construed as giving a shadow of countenance to the scheme. He appealed to the Senate to meet the question fairly, and to make the vote of laying the resolutions on the table a test question.

Mr. BUCHANAN was very much impressed with the same considerations expressed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK,] that a protracted discussion on these resolutions and amendments would obstruct the pressing and necessary business of Congress yet to be acted upon this session. There were but fifteen days of the session yet unexpired, during which a very large number of public and private bills must be acted upon. No compensating benefit could be expected from the discussion of mere abstract questions leading to no action; for experience had shown that resolutions of this kind were, from time to time, offered and discussed at former sessions, for weeks upon weeks, without leading to any practical results. He instanced several occasions, within a few years back, in which much time had been devoted to abstract discussions. At the same time, as the question of the assumption of the State debts, or of assisting the States to get out of their indebtedness, had been mooted, he concurred in the opinion that it was now necessary to have some unequivocal expression of the sentiments of the Senate on that point, and would be glad if it could be brought up either in the form proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] or in some other form; for he desired an opportunity to give expression to his sentiments. But he feared so much discussion would take place, and so many subjects of controversy would be opened up before the amendment of the Senator from Virginia could come up, that an opportunity would not be afforded of taking the vote of the Senate directly on the question; and he could, therefore, wish it had been brought forward by the Senator as a distinct proposition, on which a vote could be taken directly. He (Mr. B.) would, however, call upon the chairman of the Finance Committee to make a report on the memorials and petitions which had been referred to that committee in such numbers during the session, and hoped he would be prepared, in a day or two, to make that report.

Mr. EVANS said that no petitions were before the committee on the subject of the assumption of the State debts.

Mr. BUCHANAN said there were great numbers of petitions and memorials referred to the committee on the subject of issuing Government scrip, based on the public lands, to the amount of $200,000,000, for the relief of the States, which was the same thing.

Mr. EVANS replied that petitions in relation to a currency of two hundred millions of dollars of that kind had been referred to the committee; but they had nothing to say about the assumption of the State debts.

Mr. BUCHANAN referred the Senator to the very last petition he (Mr. B.) had presented, and which had been referred to the committee.

Mr. ARCHER concurred with the Senator from Ohio, that, the question having come before the Senate—no matter in what shape, or how—it would not now do to give it the go-by; and that there ought to be a direct vote upon it. He also concurred with the Senator from Maryland, in the necessity of applying the remaining time of the session to the real, practical business of legislation. He hoped, therefore, the suggestion he would throw out would meet the unanimous concurrence of every Senator. It was, that, after the Senator from New Jersey (who is entitled to the floor, and to whom it is in courtesy due) shall have expressed his views to-morrow, the vote on the amendments, in their order, and then on the resolutions, will be suffered to be taken without further debate.

Mr. DAYTON, seeing that the sense of the Senate was in favor of a speedy termination of a discussion which, if it proceeded, would obstruct the public business, would most cheerfully waive any intention he had of accompanying his amendment with a few remarks.

Mr. ARCHER was sorry the Senator waived his right to the floor; for he was assured, even if any indulgence were implied in the opportunity, it was fully due, and would be gladly accorded to a Senator who had so seldom availed himself of his privilege to address the Senate. He (Mr. A.) would suggest that, as soon as the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey shall have been disposed of, the direct vote on the question, which it seemed now so necessary to meet openly and frankly, could be taken on the amendment proposed by his honorable colleague, [Mr. RIVES;] and that being disposed of, on any other amendments to be offered, and finally on the resolutions themselves, without any debate.

Mr. RIVES said he very cheerfully waived any right of accompanying his resolutions with any remarks, in accordance with the suggestion of his colleague.

Mr. WALKER thought, as the Senator from New Jersey had waived his right to speak, and the Senator from Virginia had done the same, there could be no difficulty in the way of proceeding at once to the vote, and the whole matter might be disposed of in half an hour.

Mr. CALHOUN objected, that there was not, at that late hour, a full attendance of Senators; and it was extremely desirable every Senator should have an opportunity of recording his vote upon such a momentous subject. He would, therefore, suggest the propriety of agreeing, by general consent, to take the vote at one o'clock to-morrow, and let it be understood that a full attendance will be expected at that hour.

Mr. SIMMONS did not understand the additional resolution on the subject of State credit, which was offered by the Senator from Maine, had any bearing whatever on the question of the assumption of the State debts. He thought it would be very difficult to take silent votes on such incongruous resolutions and amendments; for if all were adopted, they would make a string of contradictions.

Mr. MERRICK should persist in his notice, that if the discussion was to proceed, he should move to-morrow to lay the whole subject on the table. He would do this, not to evade any question, but simply to get forward with the public business. At such a late period of the session, it was insufferable that every possible question of agitation which distracted the country should be got up to the total annihilation of all the practical legislative duties of Congress.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved an adjournment; but gave way to

Mr. LINN, who submitted a resolution which he had intended to offer in the morning hour. After which,

Mr. McDUFFIE observed that, yielding to the very forcible reasons urged by the Senator from Maryland, much as he desired to answer some of the remarks of the Senator from Maine, he would waive all right of reply, on the understanding that the question on the amendments and resolutions would be taken to-morrow, at 1 o'clock, without debate.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 14, 1843.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD of Maine presented a petition signed by certain widows of officers and soldiers of the revolutionary war, to wit: Jane Record, Abigail Record, Miriam Hull, Margaret Tobin, Hannah Lombard, Betsey Penfilly, Sarah French, Sylva Conant, Lucy Bailey, Mary Stevens, Margaret Cushman, Mary Needham, Rachel Field, Anna Gold, Sarah Perkins, Mary Hubbard, Sarah Sturtevant, Elizabeth Fletcher, Mary Holmes, Mary Fuller, Jennet Washburn, Polly Soule, Naomi Briggs, Mehitable Perkins, Anna Tucker, and Sarah Gardner, residing in Buckfield and vicinity, Oxford county, Maine, praying for an extension of the pension law of July 7, 1838; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union—a bill for that purpose being now before that committee.

Mr. BOWNE presented the petition of Frederick Juliand and 29 other citizens of Greene, Chenango county, New-York, praying that Congress will promptly act upon and adopt the exchequer, or plan of finance, as recommended by the President.

Mr. McKEON presented the petition of inhabitants of the city of New York, praying for a reduction of the expenses of the National Government, the abolition of the franking privilege, and a reduction of the rates of postage.

Mr. J. T. MASON laid on the table additional papers in relation to the claim of Jona. Shafer of Washington county, Maryland: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. JACK presented the petition of 117 citizens of Clearfield county, in Pennsylvania, praying the establishment of a mail route along the Snow Shoe turnpike, in said county: referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

EXCHEQUER.

Mr. BARNARD rose and inquired if there was a special order for to-morrow.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BARNARD then said that, without moving any special order, he should ask the House to go into committee on Thursday, with a view to take up the exchequer bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and the substitute for that bill submitted by himself. He wished that subject to have preference over all other business.

Mr. ARNOLD obtained the floor, and was about to call up the special order, (bill No. 548,) when

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON wished to know whether the special order overrode all other business, the morning hour included.

The SPEAKER said it did.

At the request of several gentlemen, Mr. ARNOLD yielded the floor, with a view to the reception of reports from committees.

Mr. J. T. MASON presented a petition from the State of Maryland, numerously signed, asking for the relief of Amos Kendall from the fine imposed on him by the circuit court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MALLORY, from the select committee on the coast survey, made a report.

Mr. ARNOLD presented a petition from the city of New York, numerously signed, praying a reduction of postages, and the passage of bill No. 548. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee on Claims, made an adverse report upon the claim of John J. Bulow.

Mr. RANDALL of Maine, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Blooming Youth; a bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Dove, of Lippican; and a bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Flo-rilla: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. R. also reported several Senate bills, without amendment.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a joint resolution in relation to bounty land patents: read a third time, and passed.

Mr. H. also made an adverse report upon the petition of Cadwallader Wallace.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to confirm the sale of public lands in certain cases. Read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. T. also reported Senate bills "to perfect the titles to lands south of the Arkansas river, held under New Madrid locations, and pre-emption rights under the act of 1814," and "An act in relation to the two per cent. fund of the State of Mississippi." Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to regulate the mode of paying over to the State of Alabama the two per cent. fund relinquished to said State by the act commonly known as the distribution act of 1841.

After a short debate, in which Messrs. BRIGGS, CHAPMAN, GWIN, STANLY, and JACOB THOMPSON participated, the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

THE WAREHOUSING SYSTEM.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY said he was instructed by the Committee on Commerce to state that it was their desire that the warehousing bill should be taken up, and a day set apart for its consideration. As there appeared to be some doubt whether the House would consider the bill this session or not, he moved to make it the special order for this day week, for the purpose of testing the sense of the House as to their disposition to act upon it. He made the motion, and desired the vote on it to be considered as a test.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON inquired if the motion was in order.

The SPEAKER said it was not.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY said he would take an early opportunity of making the motion he had intimated.

THE DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, said he was instructed to report a resolution to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill for the recharter of the District banks. He wished the vote on the resolution to be made a test vote.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to extend the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, being House bill No. 676.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that the resolution be laid on the table, and asked the yeas and nays on the motion.

They were taken, and resulted—yeas 87, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Beeson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Borden, Bowne, Brewster, A. V. Brown, C. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Clinton, Coles, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Doan, Eastman, John Edwards, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Gustine, Gwin, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, Jack, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Linn, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, John Thomson Mason, Mathews, Miller, Mitchell, Newhard, Partridge, Pickens, Plumer, Reed, Reding, Reynolds, Riggs, Rogers, Roosevelt, Sanford, Saunders, Shields, William Smith, Snyder, Steenrod, Stratton, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Van Buren, Weller, Westbrook, Joseph L. Williams, Wood, and John Young—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, M. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Crawford, Garrett Davis, Deberry, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, A. Lawrence Foster, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Granger, Green, Hall, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, James, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, King, Lane, McKennan, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Meriwether, Moore, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Pearce, Pendleton, Pope, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Rayner, Rencher, Ridgway, Rodney, James M. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Yorke, and Augustus Young—108.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution. He said to extend the charter of six banks in this District for ten years, without one moment's consideration or debate, was an outrage upon all propriety in legislation.

The resolution was then adopted—yeas 114, nays 98, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Barton, Boardman, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, William Butler, Calhoun, Thomas J. Williams, and John Young—98.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL rose, to move that the bill 649 be made the special order of the day for Thursday next.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order to make that motion, unless by general consent.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL hoped general consent would be given; for the bill was a very important one. [It was understood to be the bill to suspend the operation of the districting section of the apportionment bill, under the late census.]

Mr. BARNARD appealed to the gentleman from South Carolina to allow committees to be called for reports, before he introduced his motion.

The SPEAKER said the calling of committees for reports was the business in order; and he continued the call, beginning with the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a joint resolution relating to certain public property purchased for the United States in the city of Detroit. It was read twice, and ordered to be printed.

JESSE HOYT.

Mr. BARNARD said he was directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a resolution for the printing of the memorial of Jesse Hoyt, which was presented to the House a few days ago.

Mr. BOARDMAN requested permission to make a personal explanation on that subject, as he had been abused by that man [Jesse Hoyt] in the newspapers. He then went on, by general consent, to make some statements of the reasons he had for offering a resolution in this House on this subject at the last session, as Jesse Hoyt had attributed to him unworthy motives. He read extracts from the reports of the commissioners who were sent to investigate the affairs of the New York custom-house; from which he found that Jesse Hoyt—a man who was guilty of robbing the public treasury—had, in his character of collector, charged $201,508 in addition to his other fees allowed by the Government; and he had wished to know if the Government was in the habit of allowing such charges. He said he could not have had any personal object in abusing Jesse Hoyt, for he did not even know the man, though he believed he was introduced to him some years ago, when Jesse Hoyt bore the character of an honest man; but that was a long time ago. This explanation which he now made was, perhaps, unnecessary; and for occupying the time of the House with it, perhaps he ought to apologise; for the abuse of a rogue like Jesse Hoyt—who was cast off even by the subterranean Locofoco Democracy of New York, attached as they were to plunder—could affect no honest man.

Mr. BARNARD said the letter to which the gentleman from Connecticut referred—which had been published in the public papers—was one which no decent man could countenance; but the memorial (the printing of which he now moved) was respectful in its character.

Mr. ARNOLD interrupted the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] who was proceeding with his remarks, and said the debate was useless. He inquired if the morning hour had not expired, and expressed his anxiety that the House would not consume its time with useless discussions, when the day ought to be devoted to the special order—which was his bill No. 548.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman from Tennessee that committees were called for reports by general consent.

After some few observations from several gentlemen, the question of printing was negatived.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Judiciary Committee, reported a Senate bill without amendment. It was an act altering the time of holding the circuit courts of the district of Connecticut; and as it was unobjectionable, it was read a third time and passed.

Mr. ARNOLD then moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON desired the gentleman to withdraw the motion, to enable him (Mr. CAVE JOHNSON) to make a report from the Select Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. EVERETT rose to a privileged question, amidst great confusion; and some explanation ensued between him and the Speaker, which was not audible at the reporter's desk.

MISSISSIPPI STATE BONDS.

Mr. GWIN rose, and desired permission to make a few remarks, which were of an explanatory character.

Mr. ARNOLD said there were at least twenty gentlemen who desired the floor; and he could not yield.

He, however, afterwards consented, on an explanation of Mr. GWIN's object.

Mr. GWIN asked the indulgence of the House a moment to enable him to reply to some statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] on Saturday last, as reported in the Intelligencer of yesterday morning. He would remark that, from the noise around him during the time the gentleman was addressing the House, he had not heard the gentleman make the statements as they are reported, or he would have corrected them at the time. The gentleman is reported to have said:

"Mr. GRANGER came not here to speak with disrespect of any man who had been elevated to the chief magistracy of one of the States of this confederacy; but let gentlemen, after the execution of these bonds—after the sale, delivery, and receipt of the $5,000,000—turn to the message of Governor McNutt, and what did they find? That he had yielded his individual opinions to the voice of the people of Mississippi! The bonds had been issued; there was no pretence that the $5,000,000 had not been received; but when the pay-day came, the morality of Mississippi pocketed the $5,000,000, and started back with holy horror at the idea of paying what they had received!"

Sir, (said Mr. GWIN,) this statement is a tissue of misrepresentations of fact—no doubt unintentional. The expression attributed to Governor McNutt was made in reference to signing the bank charter, and not to the sale of the bonds. As to the statement that there was no pretence that the five millions of dollars had not been received, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. It is not the fact—not a word of it; for the main ground taken by the party in that State who are opposed to assuming the payment of these bonds, is, that the money was never received by the State, but by the bank; for whose acts and debts the State is not liable, as the act under which it was organized is unconstitutional and of no effect, so far as the liability of the State is concerned. As to having pocketed the five millions, and starting back with horror when pay-day came, there is more poetry than truth in it. The State has always been willing to appropriate every dollar of the assets of the bank to the payment of the bonds, except that portion which has been paid to the bank by repudiation under the bankrupt law, and thus passed out of the control of the bank. He presumed the gentleman entertained no holy horror at thus destroying the means of the bank to pay these bonds, to the amount of one or two millions of dollars.

The gentleman stated further, that the bonds were sold above par. This is not the fact. They were sold under par, if gold and silver was to be the standard, and on a credit; in both respects violating the unconstitutional supplement under which they were issued. The bank sold her checks upon this fund at a premium, it is true, in exchange for her irredeemable depreciated paper. She first dishonored her paper, and then shaved the holders in selling her checks; and this is called selling her bonds above par.

He would detain the House no longer at present; yet he would, before the session closed, pay his respects to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] as a teacher of morals to the State of Mississippi, as it may be instructive to the people of that State to know who the honor-and-dignity party there had selected as their champion here.

Mr. GRANGER said, before he proceeded to comment on the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, he would make a remark on another subject. He then quoted from the published reports of the debate between himself and the gentleman from Mississippi on a previous day.

Mr. G. then went on to say that he wished his disclaimer to be broad. He considered the matter as past. Unless his disclaimer had been made in good faith, it would not have been made at all. His remarks were made after full advisement; and, had his intention been to insult the gentleman from Mississippi, no disclaimer whatever would have been offered.

Mr. GWIN wished to know whether he was to understand the gentleman as having said or implied anything derogatory to him.

Mr. GRANGER said he did not mean to attack the character of the gentleman from Mississippi. He wished the House and the nation to pass upon what had occurred between them.

Mr. GWIN said he wished to know distinctly, inasmuch as the gentleman had alluded to the subject, whether he attributed to him any conduct unbecoming a member of the House of Representatives and a gentleman.

Mr. GRANGER said, no; he did not intend to assail, in any manner, the conduct or motives of the gentleman from Mississippi. He further stated that he felt it due to himself to say that the word "brag," at the conclusion of his printed speech, was not used by him.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi (Mr. GRANGER yielding the floors) said he wished to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to other portions of his reported remarks. That gentleman stated that, in making the motion he did a few days since, his (Mr. T.'s) objects were two-fold: one was to get up a political excitement; the other was to bring into disrepute the credit of the United States. Now (Mr. T. said) he was incapable of acting in his representative capacity with any such objects or motives. His whole course in this House was a refutation of the charges; and to make such allegations was doing him a manifest injustice.

Mr. GRANGER said he did suppose that the gentleman wished to get up a political discussion upon this subject, and he also supposed that the gentleman wished, by getting up such a discussion, to throw upon the majority in Congress the responsibility of having brought the credit of the Government of the United States into disrepute.

Mr. THOMPSON rose and said that, in thus supposing, he supposed what was false.

Mr. GRANGER. What did you say?

Mr. THOMPSON said that, in supposing him to act with the imputed objects, he [Mr. GRANGER] supposed what was false.

Mr. GRANGER resumed, and proceeded to vindicate himself from the charge that he had unjustly declared that, after receiving $5,000,000 upon bonds sold, the State of Mississippi had repudiated those very bonds. He had stated no more than what he could prove. He had stated that, under the laws of Mississippi, the Governor of that State was authorized to sign a large amount of the bonds of the Union Bank, and to subscribe to $5,000,000 of the stock of that institution. The Governor did sign the bonds, and did subscribe to the stock of the bank. The bonds—to the amount of $5,000,000—were sold, and the money paid, and became the capital of the bank. The bonds were sold for $5,080,000; being a premium of $80,000.

Mr. GWIN rose to make a correction. The bank issued post notes, which were irredeemable, and under par. It sold its checks on the Bank of the United States for irredeemable paper, which never was at par with gold and silver. The bonds were sold under par, and payment received in irredeemable paper, contrary to law, and in violation both of the charter of the bank, and of the supplemental charter, which was passed subsequently.

Mr. GRANGER resumed, and disclaimed the idea of intending to speak disrespectfully of the Governor of any State in the Union. He then went into an examination of the condition and history of the Union Bank of Mississippi—contending that the supplemental charter, now so universally condemned, was passed by 14 Whigs and 36 Democrats. Its charter was signed by the Governor; and subsequently he signed $5,000,000 of bonds, in accordance with that charter. The bonds were sold, and the money received into the Union Bank. How did the authorities of Mississippi then treat this institution? They recognised it as a bank, and declared that the dividends on the $5,000,000 should go towards internal improvement and education. Subsequently, the State borrowed $75,000 of the bank, and then $25,000 more. It caused certain lots in Jackson city to be sold, and received in payment promissory notes, which it caused to be discounted as mercantile paper at this same Union Bank. Mr. G. read from the message of Gov. McNutt in 1841, in which the Governor treated of the finances of the State, and the transactions with the Union Bank. It would be perceived, by reading the message, that the Governor declared that he had yielded to the public will in what he had done.

Mr. GWIN said that the Governor did not allude to the sale of the bonds, when he said he had yielded to the public will, contrary to his own opinions; but referred to his having signed the charter of the bank.

Mr. GRANGER resumed, and reiterated the positions which he had previously assumed. He contended that the Governor had signed the bonds, and complained that he had to bear the odium of acts which he did not sanction. He read a letter, written in May, in which it was stated that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. GWIN]—who was to be the bearer—would explain the causes of the non-payment of the bonds, &c.

Mr. GWIN said that the letter referred to by the gentleman was written by Judge Turner, of the Supreme Court of Mississippi. He (Mr. G.) had never heard of it until it appeared in print. The judge wrote to him, after the publication, asking if he (Mr. G.) recollected having carried the letter, and also whether he remembered having a conversation with him (Judge T.) upon the subject; to which he replied, that he recollected neither the one nor the other.

Mr. GRANGER said the letter to which he referred was written to show that the Union Bank never received but $5,000,000 on the bonds.

Mr. GWIN said the letter was written after the bonds were issued.

Mr. GRANGER said it was true; but the Governor signed the bonds.

Mr. GWIN. Nobody doubts that.

Mr. GRANGER resumed, and, after some further remarks, concluded by saying that, had the State of Mississippi, yielding to the force of hard times, asked the world for time to pay her obligations, instead of repudiating them, her action would not have had the disastrous effect on the credit of the country which was now experienced.

Here Mr. ARNOLD rose and claimed the floor.

Mr. GWIN wished five minutes to explain.

Mr. ARNOLD declined yielding.

RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of bill No. 548, in order that it might be acted on in the House at once.

Mr. FILLMORE suggested that the adoption of this motion would preclude all opportunity for amendment. He proposed to the gentleman to withdraw his motion and submit a resolution, that the Committee of the Whole shall proceed at 3 o'clock this day to vote upon all amendments offered, or that may be offered, to the bill.

Mr. ARNOLD accepted of the proposition.

The resolution for taking the bill out of committee at 3 o'clock to-day was then agreed to—ayes 92, noes 78.

On motion of Mr. ARNOLD the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, [Mr. BARNES in the chair.]

House bill No. 548, "A bill to reduce the compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives, and to the delegates of the Territories, and repealing all the laws on the subject," was taken up, and read through, together with the amendments made thereto by the Select Committee, to whom it had been referred at the last session of Congress.

The bill having been read,

Mr. GWIN offered the following as a substitute for the bill; which was read for information:

A BILL to retrench the expenditures of the Government of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the 30th day of June next, the pay and emoluments of all offices existing on the 4th day of March, (inclusive,) 1825, under the Government of the United States, whether civil, military, or naval, which have been increased since that period, shall be reduced to the rate at which they then were: Provided, That, in every case where the pay and emoluments of any office have been reduced since the 4th day of March, 1825, this act shall not be so construed as to change such reduction.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 30th day of June next, the pay and emoluments of every office under the Government of the United States, whether civil, military, or naval, created since the 4th of March, 1825, shall be reduced at the rate of twenty per centum.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no officer under the Government of the United States shall be allowed any extra compensation whatever.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the session of Congress shall be protracted beyond five months, the per diem pay of the members thereof, thereafter, shall be at the rate of four dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HUNT also offered the following as a substitute for the bill, which was read for information:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, instead of the daily compensation now allowed by law, there shall be paid, annually, to the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates from Territories, of every future Congress of the United States, the following sums, respectively, that is to say: To the President of the Senate pro tempore, when there is no Vice President, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, three thousand dollars each; to each Senator, (other than the President pro tempore, as aforesaid,) member of the House of Representatives, (other than the Speaker,) and Delegate, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the pay provided for in the first section of this act, each Senator, at every session of Congress, and every meeting of the Senate in the recess of Congress, after the 3d day of March, 1843, shall be allowed and paid four dollars for every twenty miles of estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting; and each Representative and Delegate of every future Congress shall be allowed and paid four dollars for every twenty miles of estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, at the commencement and end of every such session; and the aforesaid allowances shall be certified and paid, in the same manner as the daily compensation and travel fees to members of Congress have heretofore been.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts, on the subject of compensation to members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives; and Delegates of Territories, be, and the same are hereby, repealed, from and after the 3d day of March, 1843.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS asked leave to offer an amendment.

Mr. CUSHING observed that there would be time enough to offer amendments after the debate had closed. All these amendments were consuming the short time allowed for debate, and he must object to any more of them.

The CHAIR then stated that the bill having been referred to a select committee, and reported back, with amendments, by that committee, the regular order of proceeding would be, first to pass on the amendments of the committee, and such amendments as might be offered to them; and then to consider such amendments as might be offered by members of the House.

The amendments of the committee were then read; and the question was put on the first amendment proposed, substituting the 5th day of December next for the 1st day of November, [the time the bill is to go into operation,] and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MOORE offered several amendments, which were not heard; but the Chair decided them to be out of order.

Mr. CUSHING moved to strike out the first section of the bill; but the Chair decided the amendment not to be in order.

After a conversation on points of order by Messrs. CUSHING, MOORE, ARNOLD, BARNARD, and the CHAIR, during which there was a good deal of noise and confusion, and no practical result,

Mr. CUSHING moved that the committee rise; which motion was rejected—ayes 70, noes 73.

Mr. CUSHING then moved that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. ARNOLD claimed the floor, and said he would not yield it for any such motion. The gentleman might go on and discuss the pending amendment if he pleased.

Mr. CUSHING inquired of the Chair whether in this amendment he might discuss the question of the compensation of members of Congress generally.

The CHAIR said it would not be in order to do so.

Mr. CUSHING. Then I understand there is no way of discussing the merits of this bill.

The question was then put on the next amendment, which was to insert the word "mileage" in the 20th line, so as to make the sentence read "No Senator shall be allowed for mileage a sum exceeding six dollars per day"—but no quorum voting

The CHAIR made a count of the House, and ascertained that a quorum was present.

Mr. HOLMES then offered an amendment to the amendment, providing that no member of Congress shall receive a greater sum for mileage than his reasonable travelling expenses from the place of his residence to the seat of Government, together with $8 per day for every day's travel.

The CHAIRMAN inquired where the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina was intended to come in.

Mr. HOLMES replied. Anywhere you may think proper.

Mr. ARNOLD said if the amendment did not apply, he should object.

Mr. HOLMES suggested that it should come in after the word "mileage."

Great confusion ensued, in the course of which many gentlemen were on the floor speaking at the same time. Ultimately the committee agreed to rise, and the committee rose accordingly at half past 1 o'clock, and reported progress.

Mr. CUSHING then rose to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER inquired if it was of a personal nature.

Mr. CUSHING replied that the Chair would judge when he had made his motion; but he should have the opportunity to appeal, if the Chair should decide against him. He then moved a reconsideration of the vote by which it was agreed to fix on three o'clock to terminate debate in committee of the whole; and on that he moved the previous question, and called for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER put the question on the motion for the previous question; and there was a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. CUSHING withdrew the call for the yeas and nays, but it was renewed in another quarter, and they were ordered. The yeas and nays were then taken, and the motion to reconsider was negatived—yeas 82, nays 110, as follows:

Williams, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—110.

Mr. MALLORY moved a call of the House.

Mr. ARNOLD was understood to deprecate that motion as unnecessary, and as a dodging of the question.

Mr. MALLORY said he never dodged anything; he always sailed under an open flag.

Mr. ARNOLD. Then meet the question now.

Mr. MALLORY. I will meet it now, and elsewhere, too.

The SPEAKER called the gentleman to order.

Mr. MALLORY called for tellers on his call for the yeas and nays; and Messrs. WELLER and BOARDMAN were appointed; and they reported a majority in favor of the yeas and nays; which being taken, resulted thus—yeas 65, nays 130.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole: agreed to.

The SPEAKER called Mr. GILMER to the chair.

Mr. GILMER asked to be excused. He could not undertake to keep order in the present state of the committee. Besides, he wished to offer some amendments himself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was then called to the chair, and the committee immediately resumed the consideration of bill No. 548.

Mr. ARNOLD claimed the floor.

Mr. HOLMES rose to a question of order, claiming the floor upon an amendment which he offered when the committee was last in session.

After some debate, in which Messrs. BRIGGS, HOLMES, BOWNE, ARNOLD, and the CHAIRMAN participated, it was decided that Mr. HOLMES might proceed.

The amendment offered by Mr. H. provided that no member of Congress shall receive for mileage a sum greater than his actual expenses in travelling to and from the seat of Government, and $3 per diem during the time occupied in so travelling.

The CHAIRMAN said that, although the amendment would make the section read very awkwardly, he ruled it admissible, as germane to the subject.

Mr. HOLMES said he did not care much whether the bill was to be passed in a symmetrical form or not. He went for the reform of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD;] and the only fault which he had to find with it was, that it did not reach the ultima thule. He was perfectly convinced that the present was the time to cut down the expenditures of this Government. If the opportunity was now lost to make a deep incision, Congress would never have it in their power again. The expenses of Congress were now so large, that he wondered the people continued to submit to them. He would not speak of their per diem, but to the exorbitant mileage. Whether the pay were fixed at eight or at six dollars a day, it would always give Western members an adequate sum. But this reduction would put others residing nearer the seat of Government in an awkward predicament. The main feature of a republican government was equality. Now, he should not feel himself upon an equality with many members, did he come here with as low a compensation as $6 a day. He argued that members residing near were liable to expenses, in exercising the rites of hospitality to their constituents, who frequently visited Washington, which members at a distance did not have to incur.

He also objected to the mileage now allowed, because it practised a deception upon the people, who supposed that members received only enough to pay their expenses, and give them a decent support. According to the bill now before the committee, they were yet to receive $6 for every 20 miles travelled. Now, the railroad cars would carry them 282 miles a day; which number, divided by 20, and multiplied by 6, would give the amount received for one day's travel in the cars—$84. He was for cutting down the mileage of the members.

As for cutting down the salaries of the cabinet ministers residing in Washington, he thought it unjust. Their present salary of $6,000, as many gentlemen on that floor knew, was wholly inadequate. He did not think they should be sheared of the little ability they now possessed to contribute to the hospitalities of the metropolis, and render our Government, through themselves, respectable in the eyes of foreign ministers. The gentleman who introduced the bill was estopped by the Constitution from making it applicable to the President and the judges. Was it not equally improper to cut down the salaries of the cabinet ministers, who bore a near relation to the President, and who had to remain here, not a few months, but all the year, and live independent of their business at home? They could not, like members of Congress, return to their farms, their merchandise, or their professions; but were compelled to remain all the year in an expensive town; therefore it was that he thought it would be extremely unjust to cut down their present salaries 20 per cent.

He begged the gentleman from Tennessee to assent to his amendment and his suggestions, since he would thereby, in case of the passage of the bill, achieve a great triumph. The bill would cut off about $2,000,000 from the expenses of the Government. If the gentleman did not assent to his amendment for reducing the mileage—coming, as he did, from a remote section of the Union, and therefore entitled to draw a heavy mileage—he would subject himself to the imputation of inconsistency. He declared here, in his place, that all the country demanded a retrenchment. What he protested against was, the cutting off a few of the outer branches of the tree. Unless it received an effectual pruning, it would not be in proportion to the roots which supported it, and which were now weak and decayed. Gentlemen must either consent to bring down the tariff to a revenue standard, or else reduce the expenditures of the Government to the measure of its revenue.

Now he observed, with great satisfaction, that the House received, yesterday, a communication from the President of the United States, and had it instantly referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. He was to judge, from that, that there were reformers on both sides of the House, willing to take the suggestions of the President, and to look into the present state of the country, and see whether its institutions can be preserved. He rejoiced that the Committee of Ways and Means had shaken off from themselves that indolence of responsibility which had hitherto kept them inactive, and were now about to take this matter in hand, and investigate it thoroughly. He hoped they would soon recommend some practical measure, and not suffer this Congress to adjourn without bringing in a tariff sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government; and that they would bring down those expenditures to a revenue tariff. He hoped that they would, disregarding particular or sectional interests—the interests of the hemp grower or the cotton manufacturer—provide for the economical expenditures of the Government, by laying the burdens of taxation equally on all. It was but six months ago that it was predicted by the gentleman from Boston [Mr. WINTHROP] that the present tariff would produce a revenue of twenty-six millions; and the result had proved that the sacrifice then made of the interests of the many for the benefit of a few, had greatly aggravated the financial embarrassments of the Government.

Mr. CUSHING observed that he should speak to the limited question embraced in the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HOLMES.] He did not believe that any portion of the people of the United States called for a reduction of the compensation of members of Congress, either in regard to their per diem or mileage; and he begged leave to call the attention of the committee to the remarkable fact, that they were at the very close of the session, with the prospect that but a small minority of the present members of the House would ever come back again. They were, therefore, legislating for their successors, and not for themselves; and reducing not their own compensation, but that of those who were to come after them. He utterly rejected the idea that, in consideration of any existing straits in the treasury, they should refuse adequate compensation to members of Congress, seeing that that treasury belonged to a rich, powerful, and growing people, both able and willing to pay their servants a fair and just compensation for their services. He denied that the compensation at present paid was too much. The Government of the United States was administered upon the assumption that its officers should be paid for their services, and not suffered, as in other Governments, to serve without pay, and derive their compensation from perquisites, or other indirect means. If members of Congress were not paid for their services, that hall would be filled, as was the case with the British House of Commons, with an opulent aristocracy, and those who were dependent on them. And if, again, they were to receive an inadequate compensation, the result would be the same, by compelling those who were poor to retire, and leave the way open to their richer competitors. It was a mistake, then, to suppose that the reduction of the pay of members of Congress was a Democratic measure. On the contrary, nothing could be more opposed to the principles of Democracy; for it would throw that House and its legislation into the hands of an aristocracy.

Mr. BEESON said the few minutes remaining would afford him time to define his main position on the bill. It was this: The expenditures of the Government must be brought within its means. That was a fixed fact—quite as redoubtable as any fixed fact which had of late been brought to their notice. His dislike to a reduction of the pay of good public servants (and such they certainly were in the mass) was great; but his dislike to the running up any higher on the people our heavy public debt and taxes was still greater. We are in great distress, public and private. By some kind of hocus-pocus, we have been brought to this condition without the intervention of war, famine, or pestilence. Yes, we have been brought to the age of "iron money and black broth," as it was foretold we should be; but not by the Democratic hard-money policy, as a Coon prophet, in 1840, falsely asserted. The journals of this Congress would show what party it was who, in the name of paper money and high wages, go for no money and almost no wages; who, on the question of resumption of payment by the banks of this District, decided, substantially, that resumption here should depend on resumption nowhere. The record shows that an act of Congress had made the resumption of the District banks to depend on the resumption of the banks of Baltimore and Richmond. The Baltimore banks resumed in their own good time, but not in good time for the banks of this District. No, indeed; they must be tinkered so as to make resumption here dependent on resumption at Richmond; which was in principle, he repeated, to make resumption here depend on resumption nowhere. This was but one step in that learned policy, which, by expanding the currency in the ratio of ten nominal dollars to one real dollar, and then contracting it as much, had robbed the people of hundreds of millions of property, and the Government of its revenue, and brought back, with a vengeance, the age of iron-money and black broth. Hear the time expired.

The time having arrived for terminating debate, the committee proceeded to act on the amendments to the first section, which was in these words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, at every session of Congress, and every meeting of the Senate in the recess of Congress, after the [fifth day of December next] first day of November next, each Senator shall be entitled to receive six dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate, and shall also be allowed six dollars for every twenty miles of estimated distance by the most usual road from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting; and in case any member of the Senate shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from such session or meeting, or after his arrival, or shall be unable to attend the Senate, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance. And the President of the Senate pro tempore, when the Vice-President shall be absent, or when his office shall be vacant, shall, during the period of his service, receive an addition to his compensation as a member of the Senate, six dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate: Provided, always, That no Senator shall be allowed for mileage a sum exceeding the rate of six dollars per day from the end of one such session or meeting to the time of taking his seat in another, except he shall have actually travelled the entire distance for which such mileage is allowed: And provided, also, That it shall be the duty of such Senator, when he applies to the President of the Senate for a check, or to have his account certified, to state the number of days he has actually attended, and also the number of days he has been absent, and whether said absence was owing to sickness or otherwise; and unless such member shall certify that he was absent by reason of sickness of himself or family, or by leave of the House, it shall be the duty of the President to give him a check or certificate only for the time he actually attended.

[NOTE.—Parts to be stricken out as recommended by the Select Committee to which this bill was referred, are printed within brackets, and insertions in italics.]

The first question was on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HOLMES,] which is given above; on which tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON and TILLINGHAST were appointed; and they reported 98 in the affirmative, and 64 in the negative.

The amendment to the amendment was, therefore, agreed to; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MERIWETHER hoped the chairman would call the House to order; for there was so much confusion, that he could not hear what the committee was doing. He hoped gentlemen would be called upon to take their seats.

An amendment was moved—but by whom could not be learned—to allow no Senator more than $300 for mileage for any one session.

The amendment was agreed to; 102 voting in the affirmative, and 68 in the negative.

Mr. WISE said that he had an amendment, which he wished to come in as an additional proviso.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, we cannot hear a solitary word. [Roars of laughter.] They are laughing here like hyenas. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WISE repeated that he had an amendment to come in, by way of proviso: Provided that, besides his pay, no Senator shall be allowed—

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, this question is not debatable. [Great laughter and confusion.] I object, Mr. Chairman, to this debate. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WISE. I am not debating it. I am dictating my amendment to the Clerk.

Provided, further, That, besides his pay, no Senator shall be allowed [cries of "roast beef"] any rations [cries of "whether was it beef or not"] in kind, other than beef—[hisses.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Oh, let him go on.

Mr. WISE in continuation—not roasted, [laughter,] and not to exceed a cost of $2. [Loud and long continued roars of laughter.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the amendment; it is as follows: Except "the guard," who are to receive foreign missions after the 4th March next. [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. [Laughter.] I move a further amendment to except the Senate, where there is no member of the guard. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN decided all these amendments to be out of order.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, order must be restored, for we cannot hear a word. [Laughter.] Gentlemen are designing—I charge, sir, that they are designedly making a noise. [Renewed laughter, cries of "order," and the loud hum of voices.] I hope, sir, the Chair will preserve order, or we must stop. [Laughter in all parts of the House.]

The CHAIRMAN then announced the question to be on the amendment recommended by the committee, as follows: "Provided, always, That no Senator shall be allowed for mileage a sum exceeding the rate of six dollars per day, from the end of one such session or meeting to the time of his taking his seat in another, except he shall have actually travelled the entire distance for which such mileage is allowed."

Mr. ARNOLD hoped that amendment would be adopted, for it was a very good one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN then stated that the question was on the amendment recommended by the committee to the proviso, which requires each Senator, when he applies to the President of the Senate for a check, or to have his account certified, to state the number of days he has actually attended; and also the number of days he has been absent, and whether said absence was owing to sickness, or otherwise; and unless such member shall certify that he was absent by reason of sickness of himself or family, or by leave of the House, it shall be the duty of the President to give him a check or certificate only for the time he actually attended.

[The amendment was the words printed in italic.]

Mr. MOORE rose to move an amendment; but, in the confused state of the House, his object was not distinctly heard. It was understood, however, to be a motion to strike out that entire proviso.

Mr. BRIGGS was heard addressing the Chair, above the noise which prevailed, but not a word was distinguishable at the reporter's desk.

Mr. EVERETT was understood to move to strike out the words "of himself or family, or by leave of the House."

Here was a loud cry of "read the section as it now stands amended."

The Clerk read it accordingly; and the strange admixture of anomalous and contradictory matter of which it was composed, elicited roars of laughter; especially that part which required a Senator to certify that, when absent, his absence was by reason of sickness of himself or family, or by leave of the House; thus making his payment for days on which he might be absent, in some cases, dependent on his ability to show that he was absent from the Senate by leave of the House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN put the question on striking out the words, "of himself or family, or by leave of the House," and he decided that he believed the motion to be lost.

A division was called for.

Mr. ROOSEVELT suggested an amendment, to strike out the word "House," and insert "Senate." [Loud cries of "No, no."]

The amendment was negatived; and the amendment proposed by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS was understood to move to strike out all the section, and insert a substitute which he had prepared; and which provided that, from the commencement of the present session of Congress, and henceforth, each Senator should receive $6 per diem, and $4 for every twenty miles travelling, to be by the usual route; and that, on taking the oath at the commencement of the session, they should be sworn to restrain the franking privilege to letters on such Senators' own business, or the extension of liberty by the circulation of documents, &c.; and providing further, that the soldiers of the army and the sailors of the navy shall have $1 a month added to their present pay —[Cries of "Agreed"]—and that all laws or parts of laws conflicting with this act should be thereby repealed.

Mr. WISE asked for tellers on that amendment.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the Chair decide that that is in order?
